A Curious Lawsnit in Paris.

The fame of Mount Saint Michael dates on her part, the accounts of which reads like the earliest ages of the Christian faith. It is a steep, rocky hill, surrounded by the sea at every tide, and accessible only by a willage, and above the village the fortified abbey, with its magnificent cathedral—one of the wonders of old French architecture—ts splendid library and unrivalled views. terrible dungeons. In ancient times the diction of the abbey extended far and wide over the adjacent shores, flat and shallow, which are left bare for miles by the receding tide. Immense lines of dyke meet the eye in every direction, enabling the patient industry of the people to reclaim large portions of the shore thus protected from the stated, a million and a half of francs. The obscure and friendless orphan who has passed the prime of her life in battling for her rights may now, if so minded, buy the hand of a needy duke or prince of half her years, and find herself on the threshold of old age surrounded by all the luxury and adulation which may so easily be purchased in this sea. Occasionally, however, the sea breaks through the dykes, destroys in an hour the work of years, and spreads ruin among the peasantry. The vast extent of sands lying round the Mount is constantly traversed by ine people of the sea twice a day obliterates all signs of travel, hollows out new channels that flow into the bay, and leaves shiftless patches of quicksands, all the more danger-just before the tour commenced. After depatches of quicksands, all the more dangerous that their position is constantly changing, which have swallowed up, in the course of ages, a goodly army of men and beasts. The region is subject, moreover, to a visitation of heavy sea-fogs, frequently fatal to travelers who, losing their way, are unable to get across the bay before the tour commenced. After describing the personal appearance of Rossini and his performance on the piane, the impression continued.
