THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Secretary Stanton is quietly in possession of his office, and the work of his department is moving on as smoothly as possible.

Many persons, even among the friends of the Republican party, are disturbed by the notion that there is something dreadfully "indecent" in Mr. Stanton's present position.

It is not the least of the reasons for this feeling that the Secretary of War is a man of high standing in the public eye.

But even if the Secretary felt that his present position was an indecent one, it is not to be questioned that he is a man of high standing in the public eye.

There are times and occasions when public men must be governed by higher considerations than those of personal policy.

Mr. Stanton is now under such an occasion. The time has come when he is the sole remaining representative in the Executive department of the Government.

The Princess Theatre, London, where for a number of years he delighted the lovers of dramatic art by a succession of revivals of Shakespearean plays, brought out in a style never before unequalled.

Mr. Stanton was in better spirits, or better fitted to cope with the "revolving door" than at the present time. It is so early the will of the people and the demand of imperative circumstances that he shall remain where he is.
