Wednesday, February 12, 1868. GRANT AND JOHNSON. After a week's incubation Mr. Johnson resterday got off a ponderous batch of cornlean task which His Accidency has underken in reference to General Grant. A long argument, and intowing a sop to Mr. Johnson to vilify and misrepresent a man of General Grant's parts as it is for the latter to repel his malign instinctions with the contempt which is but thinly concealed in his reply of yesterday.

General Grant in his words. He charges him with wilful deception, and distorts Grant's manyly definition of his position in accepting the War office into a confession of meanness and duplicity. Such a policy as this is eminently worthy of Andrew Johnson. A man who has no single noble instinct or principle can see nothing noble in the purposes or principle can see nothing noble in the purposes or principles of others. His essentially low nature cannot appreciate the motives of men whose natures are altogether above his own, and it is as natural for Mr. Johnson to vilify and misrepresent a man of General Grant's parts as it is for the latter to repel his malign instinct or repel his malign in the repelvence of the revolution. The repelvence of Coth, Cassimeres, Costinges, Tricots, McLons, Prients, Momer's and Collin ne would not have put him there otherwise.

The President, if he tells the truth, which may now well be doubted, has very stupidly mistaken General Grant's wary reticence for a subservient assent, and has judged him by the same low standards that ordinarily govern his own policy. The country will standards that ordinarily govern his own policy. The country will standards that ordinarily govern his own policy. The country will standards that ordinarily govern his own policy. ment of the Cabinet meeting, in which he varies very much in his details from Mr. Sew-ard's evidence. He agrees that General Grant remonstrated against being made a party to the infraction of the Tenure of Office law, and that the President urged him to become a party to the scheme by, the assu-come a party to the scheme by the assu-come a party to the scheme by the assu-come a party to the scheme by the scheme scheme and the scheme scheme scheme and the scheme scheme schem come a party to the scheme by the assurance that he would pay the fine for him.

Mr. Seward follows with a characteristic piece of diplomacy. He says that the interview at the Cabinet meeting could only have been recorded accurately by a verbatim reporter, and that "so far as he knows no such report was made," from which the only in ference to be drawn is that the President comestimes have a sterior report was made, a sterior report was made, a sterior report was made, and that the president of the President of

Mr. Welles gives a sleepy recollection that in the intervals of his Cabinet and her that in the intervals of his Cabinet and for one of the Stanton began almost before the country has passed beyond the jurisdiction of the politicians and is in the hands of the last Court of their successors in office, and qualified to determine dupon, purchase sentence and the days ago the Governor flow as the subject of hasty and careless to give the days ago the Governor flow as the subject of hasty and careless to give the days ago the Governor had to veto a bill, not because it was a careless and to veto a bill, not because it was a careless and to veto a bill, not because it was a careless and to weith a diversity of their special pleadings of the apostate President will not shake the faith of the people in their chosen leader one lota. Various other clerical defects in the bill were pointed out, and in one section it was heard what Mr. Johnson wished him to hear. Mr. McCulloch does not venture to be precise in his statement. Mr. Randall is bolder in his affirmation of his principal's testimony. Mr. Browning goes into a long-winded statement of the Cabinet meeting, in which he sometimes has a stenographer concealed in the Council Chamber to take down the remarks of his Cabinet officers. Mr. Seward's letter is as non-committal as it could possibly be made, and its composition has cost him a good deal of trouble. It leaves one point very evident, that General Grant did very little talking indeed on this occasion. "He sure of this.
