Geometry is the science of this knowledge. It deals with the primary forms which are claborated or disfigured in every object that we see, and one can no more attain prominerce in art by endeavoring to set aside elementary figures in order to reach their more elegant developments than a builder could, who, with an ornate edifice to imitate, should proceed without finding the simple proportions of his model. The artist who makes a study of some beautifully chiselled tomb or pedestal flouid certainly be able to draw a box accurately, and we may be sure that

The carpenter and mason are the geometricians of every-day life, and we have learned more in watching their labors than we may at first imagine. Let us develop this learning; lot us put it more constantly into practice, in thought if not by actual demonstration; let us renew the satisfaction in our own work which we have felt in seeing the accuracy of that accomplished by others, and realize above all that who, after cultivating his accuracy in music, may yield to the appreciation of its melody; of the from those who work with square and
