ART FIETS.

At Avery's Art Gallery, in New York, has been placed for exhibition the cartoon of von Kaulbisch's great freece called the Epoch of the Reformation. The famous artist, the principal representative of the "intellectual" art school, sent this drawing as his only contribuition to the Paris Exposition, where it was seen, and purchased as a typical work of uncommon interest, by a wealthy American. The mural painting for which this is a study exists, if we do not mistake, in the new Pinakothek at Musich. Many afour readers have seen engravings or photographs after this famous composition, but the immense proportions of the actual drawing affect the mind, with an impression of grandeur not conferred by the smaller reduplications.

Luther stand in the centre, in an attitude all directions and vivacity, showing the bible in his two hands, as if to the whole world. In the foreground Hans Sachs, the "cooler bard," sits humbly on the earth, looking as if he wrestled with the delided, "But this to be a good by on the earth, looking as if he wrestled with the world contrary ones in the contrary ones in the contrary ones in the contrary one in the con ground Hans Sachs, the "cobler bard," sits humbly on the earth, looking as if he wrestled with his thoughts. Shakespeare is near by, with folded arms, and in the middle distance Elizabeth of England leads on the tathers of the Angelican church; the German artist, who, in his boyhood, was "brought up on" Hogarth, shows every disposition to give prominence to the importance of English thought in the intellectual renaissance of the sixteenth century. In an alcove beyond the figure of Elizabeth are seen Tycho Brahe and the astronomers; in a corresponding space at the right, Raphael and the artists. The foreground is filled with the great theologians, writers, geographers and philosophers of the epoch. At the feet of Dante lies a just exhumed bust of Virgil, indicating with one happy image both the marriage
