The investigation at Washington into the corruption of certain of the seven renegade Senators will probably result in the usual way. Skillful swearing will cover the details of the iniquity, but it will not convince any one of the innocence of men who pretend to have changed their opinions over night, upon an issue to which they were committed by oft-repeated votes and speeches. In the cases of these men the old maxim of law must be reversed, and they must be counted guilty, until they are proved to be innocent. When they can proved to be innocent.
