—New Mr. Squier continues to develop, in Harper's Magactine, the history of his explorations in general state of the string paper is the Island of Titteaca, in the great lake of the same name—the traditional cradle of Manco Capac and the Inca dynasty. This part of the narrative forms an amplification of the earlier portion of Mr. Squier's "Remarques sur la Geographie to less Monuments du Pérou," in the Bulletin de la Société de Géographie for January, 1868.

The view of the magnificent Lake of Titicaca is thus described:

"The road descends abruptly from the rocky eminence on which the town is built into a beautiful level amplitheatre two miles broad, and curves around the head of a bay that here projects into the land between two high and rugged capes. The water toyed and sparkled among the capes. The water toyed and sparkled among the pubbles on the shore, and along it a troop of lively plover was racing in cager search for the minute molusks dritted up by the waves, with the advance and recession of which their line kept a wavering cadence. Past the little plain is what in Peru is called a ladera; in other words the road runs bigh up along the face of the steeps and in many places absolutely perpendicular, and have been so long in vogue in England and American for perus in the road runs bigh up along the face of the steeps and in many places absolutely perpendicular, and becomes a percent of the steeps and in many places absolutely perpendicular, and the strategic of the chapter that the strategic of the place, and strategic of the chapter that the strategic of the chapter that t Fairs for benevolent purposes, which have been so long in vogue in England and Amerroad runs high up along the face of the steep, and in many places absolutely perpendicular, headlands that overhang the lake, and becomes a mere goat's path, narrow and rugged, half worn, half cut in the rock. But neither the difficulty nor danger of the path could wholly withdraw our attention from the hundreds of wide and wonderful views that burst on our sight at every bend and turning. The bold bare peninsulas, the bluif panoramic headlands behind which the lake stole in through many a rent in their rocky pallsade, in through many a rent in their rocky pallsade, and spread out in broad and placid bays, the islands equally abrupt and bold and bare, the and spread out in oroad and placid bays, the islands equally abrupt and bold and bare, the ruddy bulk of the sacred island of Titicaca, the distant shores of Bolivia, with their silvery cincture of the Andes, the blue waters and sparkdistant shores of Bolivia, with their silvery distant shores of Bolivia, with the shores of the Andes, the blue waters and spark-cincture of the Andes of the The Anditor appointed by the Court to audit, settle and the Andes of the Anditor appointed by the Court to audit, settle and the Anditor appointed with the clouders with a sense of elevation and repose inconsistent with the babbling of waters, the rustle of leaves, and the murmurs of men."

Of the Isle of Titicaca and its traditions Mr Squier remarks:

'This is the sacred island of Peru. To it the lines traced their origin, and to this day it is held by their descendants in profound veneration. According to tradition, Mance Capac and his wife and sixter Mama Oella, children of the Sun and sixter bracing air, to inspire us with a sense of clovestion and repose inconsistent with the babbling of waters, the rustle of leaves, and the murmurs whole, the place where, and the persons by whole, the place where, and the persons by whole, the place where and the persons by the capital of the Inca empire—an empire larger than that of Adrian, grander than that of Charlemagne—which extended over more than 37 lemagne—which extended over more than 37 and the house finance. The chief treasure of the Isle was the Holy and decorators took the field; they worked day and night, and there arose, as if conjured Rock, the shelter of the Peruvian Messiah: "At almost the very northern end of the island, up by a magician's wand, on the western at its most repulsive and unpromising part, wall of the royal picture gallery, a row of where there is neither inhabitant nor trace of canopied tents of purple-colored silk, supculture, where the soil is rocky and bare and the cilffer ragged and broken, high up where the eye appeared the magnificent treasures of the picture gallery, which imparted to the whole mountain barrier to the other, from the glittering crests of the Andes to those of the Cordillera, is the spot most celebrated and most sacred of Peru. Here is the rock on which it was believed no bird would light or animal venture, on which no human being dared place his foot, whence the sun rose to dispel the primal vapors and illume the world, which was plated all over with gold and the gifts which had been contributed to the fair, and so there were thirtymountain barrier to the other, from the glittering an aspect than which nothing more gorgeous and silver, and covered, except on occasions of the most solemn festivels, with a veil of cloth of richest color and material, which sheltered the richest color and material, which sheltered the favorite children of the Sun, and the pontiff, priest and king who founded the Inca empire.

"Our guides stopped when it came in view, removed their hats and bowed low and reverently in its direction, muttering a few words of mystic import.
