Troubled Times in Corsica. A letter to the London Examiner says "Alcide Tousez, in his very comic 'Life of the Emperor," says 'He was born in Corsica, where the inhabitants have the fatiguing cus-tom of assassinating each other from father to son.' And by all accounts, nearly a contury's connection with the most civilized country in the world, has not eradicated this fatiguing custom. At Bastia a man named Aubin has just been condemned to death for killing one Antonetti. The criminal said 'An-tonetti owed me two francs; he would not pay me. I killed him.' There is something lugubriously enjerammetic in this confession.

riously epigrammetic in this confessio which for terseness equals any order of the day, or bulletin issued by Napoleon. From the above crimes some estimate may be formed of the value of the life in France and Corsica. Here an apothe-the cary only fetches a pair of military trowsers, say ten francs, and in Corsica a publican is slain for two. There have been other atroci-slain for two. There have been other atrocities committed here, three of which may be given as specimens of the state of morality:
