Surange to say, he preferred as his personal attendants those who had served with Europeans. His valet, the only one who stood by him to the last, had been a servant of Barouni, the Vice Consul at Massowah. Another, a young man named Paul, was a former servant of Mr. Walker; others had at one time been in the service of Plowden, Rell and Campron. Except his yalet, who was generally sober; but after his afternoon siesta he was invariably more or less intoxi-
