I dream of a gorgeous house When Life wove a silver thread, To hind with resistless power. My heart where a slave must trade.

I'm hearing light footsteps fall, Way off in the deathless past; I'm hearing a sweet voice call As plain as the wild storm's blast.

It sighs on the evening gale, It floats on the breath of morn, Intoned is its last sad wail

By musical fields of corn. And my thoughts go over the sea Of my life's unfailing need

Of the child God sent to me, Yet sold like a brute indeed Oh! how can I tell of the days That smote with their ruthless light:

And how of the bitter lays I sang in the wretched night! I shricked to the quiet skies.

I clutched at the pulseless sand And thorn that kindlier lies Than touch of the white man's hand !

I pressed to my burning lips The flowers she loved so well-And never the dawn now tips

The rim of the lily's bell. But my heart goes wailing down A cavern of darkest woe;

And I see the brutal town" Where that poor heart suffered so. I gaze on my darling's face,

So wan in its hopcless dread, Its agony yet I trace, As I clung to the lips I'd fed ! All pitiless of my grief

Stood gaping crowds of men, Who thought 'twas the instinct brief Of lioness in her den!

Then what of the "gorgeous" day? That day in a golden year, When on my bosom there lay A pearl in place of a tear

When thought of the mystic light That flashed from my lady's hand, Made my pet an opal bright In Slavery's iron band.

The setting was dark and rough For a gem of worth untold,

But mother-love was enough For the little child they sold ! I wondered the sun could shine!

I wondered the flowers could bloom ! For an anguish such as mine Would almost darken the tomb !

But the clouds went flitting by. And the sun looked smiling down, Till it seemed a cruel lie That lost was my peerless crown !

We'd named her Winny, in love And pride of the pretty ways, That lifted our souls above

The fretting tide of our days. She gave to our cup of tears The light which the ruby throws; And tinted our coming years With hue of the wild-wood rose.

She gilded our slavish chains, She jeweled our cabin door, In midst of dreariest rains She was sunshine on our floor!

My baby's lips were as fair. And my baby's breath as sweet As mothers' with flaxen hair And white little dimpled feet !

My heart would thrill to the touch Of fingers dainty, though brown, I loved my baby as much As mothers whiter than down

That heart was a spirit lute Heaven-tuned to a holy strain.

And strings that erewhile were mute, Can never be so again. For softly my carling swept

Hushed chords into music waves.
