Monday, August 31, 1868. SORE-HEADED DIPLOMACY. The animus of General Rosecrans's la awkward mission to the rebel conclave at the White Sulphur Springs is so evident that his attempt to deprecate public criticism and to escape the natural condemnation which follows his initial essay at diplomacy only excites a smile of contempt and derision. Geneeffects of his military failure at the West. Some of his earlier services were of great value to the country; but, like many another soldier of the early period of the war, he failed to expand with the increasing scale of events, and became, at last, a hindrance and annogance to General Grant to a degree which carried him to the verge of insubordination. General Grant was at last relieved of the presence of his unsatisfactory lieutenant. and General Rosecrans soon ceased to occupy any prominent place in the subsequent history of the war. He went into private life, sore-headed at his own want of success, and full of jealousy and ill-will toward General Grant. And this is the simple, obvious key to his late mission to the rebels at White Sulphur Springs. Possessed with some exalted idea of his diplomatic gifts, he conceived the brilliant idea that a manifesto from the leading rebels of the south, if couched in proper language, would be at once damaging to General Grant and beneficial to Seymour. He accordingly posts off to the Springs and propounds a series of leading questions to Robert E. Lee, who. in the absence of Jefferson Davis, seems to be accepted as the embodiment of the rebel sentiment. To these questions Lee replies in the desired form, and Rosecrans returns to Washington, crowning himself with the laurels of Pledged as it is to positive repudiation, even After he gets away from the gay and festive scenes of the rebel headquarters, however, he diation and consequent depreciation of the ter of his resolution to inaugurate another fathomed the secret of his mysterious

Legal tender notes have decreased $2,000,269 and the loans $3,645,055; but it is very evident that this last is not owing to any colling in of loans on the part of the banks, their supply of idle funds being still largely in excess of the demand, and yesterday the amount seeking employment at three per cent. was apparently as great as on any previous Saturday during the summer. Aug. 29.—The feature in Wall street this week is the strength and advance in prices of the Government bond market, the whole list closing from 1 to 1½ per cent. higher than on last Saturday. This has arisen from a more active demand for investment shipments.
