in the fresauries of her quick snarp with the feature of the ways of life.

I had already met her once, behind the scenes of the little German Theatre in the Bowery, on an evening when she spoke to the people of what she conceived to be woman's mission; but months had gone by the she had been by name, she drew a vacant chair near to her own, and bade me sit down and talk ralk: As well try to talk with Coleridge, or Ningara Falls, or any other wonderful thing in nature which will have its own way in spite of all obstacles. There was no chance in nature which will have its own way in spite of all obstacles. There was no chance in nature which will have its own way in spite of all obstacles. And that which should accompany old age,
As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,
I must not look to have; but, in their stead,
Curses, not loud, but deep, mouth-honor, breath,
Which the poor heart would fain deny, and dare in a crushed and helpless state belove it had fairly taken form.

Once only in half an hour did Lola stop. Not to take breath—for she had elocutionary skill, and never tired—but to roll up a fresh supply of cigarettes. She handed me one, lighted it from her own, requested that I replants for supply from a little state of the supply from a little state.

would replenish my supply from a little Russia leather reticule hanging from the arm of her chair, and proceeded to—talk. But for the arrival of a fresh installment of the invited guests of the evening, she might have invited guests of the evening, she might have talked till midnight, and I should have sat still and listened. What we talked about-or rather what she said, for I found no appreciable moment of time in which to say a word—is not to be told in brief space. She said so much of art and literature, of Old World life and manners, of American society and New World circtoms, that it was more and New World customs, that it was more like a picture painted by a master than the mere utterance of a woman to whom the rep-THE DINNER.

At eight o'clock, all the company having arrived, dinner was announced. Lola's dining-room was the front basement—a room by no means spactous, but hung about with cages of birds, decked with flowers, furnished with quaint sideboards, and rich old ornaments gathered from all the corners of the earth.
