The third target is composed of brick, stone and heavy plate wrought iron, and made to represent the casemate of a fort. It has been gotten up with much care, and it is thought to be the strongest one of the three. Aside from these three targets is a large tower, some twenty-five feet high, composed of cut gneiss, a species of stone which has not hitherto been used in the construction of fortifications. Their object liet otest its relative strength as compared with honest the day it proved more profitable to the construction of fortifications. Their object jieto test its relative strength as compared with granite.

The firing was first commenced on the target first described with a thirteen-inch smooth-bore gun, the shot being of steel, and weighing 320 pounds. The object of the artillerist was to strike the target at the embrasnre or near it, thus dismounting or disabling any piece that might have been planted behind it. The first shot was well aimed and inst grazed the side of the target.
