I had sten nothing, on any of her rivers that eould compare with it, and but one that approached it, and that was the Ionia that was on the river Clyde, in Scotland, in which the tourist can make one of the most delightful trips in that romantic land. The passengers sitting at the tables began to take out their memoranat the tables began to take out their memoran-dams, comparing bills, and apparently sorting up their day's work and laying their plans, per-ebance, of some long trip, from which they expected to realize money if no fame. Some, again, for pleasure, whiled sway the hour with a quiet cigar or mecrechaum. I was on my way to visit a sick brother, having been called by despatch. When the supper bell rang at least eighty-five persons.

the supper bell rang at least eighty-five persons, eabin passengers, sat down to supper at the two tables, and it all passed off pleasantly, and with that comfort that has made this old line famous since the days of Captain Summons. A band of Italians played sweet music while we were eating, and a bridal party with their friends were enjoying themselves, merrily, as was meet. After the tables were cleared, they were then removed to make way for the amuse-ment of a cotilion party, and with an innocent jey they spent about an hour. Not indulging myself, I sat reading, and oceasionally looking at a venerable gentleman with hair as white as snow, reading a newspaper without glasses. I, a much younger man, could not read then with-ont them, and I speculated some on the wonder-ful power he had over me. Being an entire strateger to him, and never forward to introduce myeelf, 1 said nothing to him, but thought next morning I might say something, but, alas ! never as him again. It was now after 10 o'clock, and one of the

This was Captain J. McCammant. He had seen the painful death of his two nieces, and was clinging to a spar, not a hundred yards from the burning boat. When I could speak I remarked to the Captain: "That poor man." I learned after that he got some planks, and some man standing by had a few nails. They made a raft few minutes, and getting able to walk,
