"Onward." Captain Mayne Reid, secure already of the ears of our adventurous youths and of the Desdemonas who "love him for the dangers he has passed," now commits himself to tell them stories month by month; in other words, he starts a mensual magazine. Onward is ovidently to be the "organ" of travelers, Crusoes, with method weekly in the more as the events of his official period bear the strong impress of his own will and genius. This is to a man of his disposition a reward which compensates for the exertions of years. There are men, born great and wealthy, whose only pleasure in politics must be derived from getting and keeping of power. They find themselves possessed by birth and position of all that a man like Disraell attains to after the labor and success of years. They do not want social consideration or party connection, but they enjoy the authority which the actual possession of office gives. On the other hand, a Commoner recommended only by his genius is almost sufficiently rewarded for his tells by the mere attainment of high office. The first congratulations of friends and the first curiosity of the public afford such gratification that they almost exhaust his capacity of future cujoyment. It may often happen that the most ambled weekly. The first congratulations of friends and the corner in politics.

The first number has handsome open type on clean white pages, a few unpretending engravings, and a repertory in which we are treated to a great part of the cold air of his lofty solitude, and very coherently begin to descand. in which we are treated to a great part of the North and South American continents at once. To the gallant Reid, the spirit-stirrer, we attribute the first story, "The Lost Sister," the scene of which lies in South American Army, is the subject of a spirited paper. The other prose articles are fairly readable. We recommend to the companionable Captain to keep to his speciality of adventure-stories, to supkeep to his speciality of adventure-stories, to suppress the poetry, to exchange his four engravings for a single one of quadruple merit, and in that lighter accountement to ride gallantly on. We promise to be always entertained with his magazine while it continues the spirit with which it starts. The brisk publisher, Carieton, is the longer pressario, and Turner Brothers, of 808 Chestnut street, are Agents for this State. The yearly suppersyntant is $2,50 aingle conies 30 cents.
