Mortal Effect of the Recent Proceedings in the House of Representatives.

[From the London Times, Feb. 1.]

It is through discussions such as that in the House of Representatives on the Protectorate of Hayd and San Domingo that the American character is appreciated. Foreigners find a difficulty in understanding how such a discussion could have arisen at all, and still more, how it could have proceeded as it did. They are puzzled to see such a person as Gen. Banks take the position of Chairman of the Select Affairs Committee of some four years in succession. This serves him that is of slight reputation among his own countrymen, and that the reports or propositions he makes, whether on naturalization, the conflict of laws, the rights and obligations of neutrals, or any other subject that arises, are either suppressed or transformed so that they cannot recognize them in their ultimate shape. Theirs, however, is not lessened when they follow the discussions of the popular branch of the Legislature upon General Banks' proposals. The sound conclusions of the majority are scarcely able to efface the memory of the wild theories that are broached, and applied to every question of interest, and every decision expressed. The explanation of the anomaly is simple. The truth is, that while no people are so educated in the art and mystery of domestic government as the Americans, no people are more ignorant of the principles of international conduct and the politics of foreign States. A few lawyers, who are never found in the Legislature, thoroughly understand international law; but the mass of the nation know nothing of it, and as little of the principles of government in other countries. The House of Representatives, uncheked, as the House of Commons commonly is, by the presence of two or three masters of the subjects, is entirely at the mercy of foreign influences, and, for discussion, are often made to force their way through a multitude of words darkening knowledge before they can form a conclusion. It is to their infinite credit for moderation and sagacity that the conclusions they do form under such unpromising circumstances do commonly command our respect by their good sense and justice.

FRANCE.

The Body of Louis Philippe—Napoleon's statue.

The French Senate, on January 28, had before it two petitions calling for the removal of the remains of Louis Philippe to France. The grounds brought forward in one of these petitions were that the late King had brought the bones of Napoleon from St. Helena to France, and that the Masters' address was then delivered by John H. Campbell, A. M., of the class of February, 1864.

The meeting then adjourned.
