[From the Overland Monthly.]. Two journeying forms upon a purple moor-A shadowy level, boundless but for sky. Both faces westward, watching the lost light In clouds of dreamy garnet softly die.

One face a silent cestasy of peace, Blent with the pallor of strong suffering: one Haggard and passionate with supreme regret, And eager-eyed toward the sunken sun.

One voice a rapture: "Speed, O sacred night, Une voice a rapture: "Speed, O sacred night, The noiseless tamult of thy stars! At last Ease my sin-wearled gaze and bring the rest That southes while still we toil, stern day being past!"

One voice a pathos of despair, low-toned And desolately mouraful: "Canst thon see These dim cloud colors here above, nor dream How fair below that dawning world must be? NEW PUBLICATIONS.

COMEDIAN.

[From the London Glowworm, Feb. 5.] One of the best actors of the present cenever trod the stage-Robert Keeley, passed quietly away to his rest on Wednesday afterdear to the theatrical profession-and surrounded by the members of his tamily. It is more than ten years since his last appearance on the stage, and ten years since is, to use the slang phrase of the day, such an "awful time in matters theatrical, that to very many of our readers Mr. Keeley's neme and fame will be but traditional. He had seen both of the comedians above named, and Elliston and "Billy" Blanchard; he had been contempo-raneous with Liston; John Reeve, Farley, Buckstone, Wright, Rogers, Robson and other famous mimes, but he imitated none of them. His humor was special, he was his own schoolmaster and his own scholar, though occesionally one catches a reflex of though occasionally one catches a reflex of the exquisitely dry sententious fun in the stolid manner and noteless voice of Compton Born in 1793.
