BY WADE ROBINSON heard the step of the rain.
 In the dead of the night in the street,
 And a sound of tears and pain,
 Was the sound of his liquid feet.

THE RAIN.

I heard his sorrowful showers In the wood behind the town, And the gasp of the struggling flowers, As he tried to beat them down.

But when I awoke at morn The dawn was in the skies,

And an echoing splendor was born In the light of tearfal eyes.

That day was the first of May, And a voice was down the earth, A hum of dance and play. And a ring of laughter and mirth.

The rain was past and gone, But he hung, a viewless sprite, In the heaven of clouds that shone With amber and crimson light

And he saw the work he had wrought. To the music of cobs and tears, When the leaves and blossoms fought,

But now the scented breeze. And the shimmering flowers and trees,

And fainted, and died in tears

Are singing together his praise Ob, ever since that strain

Comes sweetly to unite With the dreary plash of rain That I heard at dead of night. For Winter is nurse to May,

And doubt the builder of Faith, And Night is the fountain of day, And Life is the daughter of Death.
