Miss Martineau's preface to the second edition of her "Biographical Sketches" speaks of the moral aspects of a biographer's undertaking. "Between confusion of thought on the one hand," she remarks, "and unchastened feelings on the other, it is no wonder if a large proportion of readers fall to apprehend the purpose of biographical portraiture altogether." From the need of consolation, for charity's sake, or good taste, or to encourage tionable statement at the bottom of the page * gether." From the need of consolation, for charity's sake, or good taste, or to encourage goodness by a perfect image, or blinded by intellectual eminence to moral faults, she adds, biographers say nothing but good of the dead, and she continues: "As I do not recognize any of these points of view, I have worked from a different one. To me it but good of the dead, and she continues: "As I do not recognized any of these points of view, I have worked from a fiberent one. To mongood many violences upon the propriet of the points of the poin there were no such writings as ins, our since he learned of their author's attitude towards religion their charm was gone.

Ruskin's former wife is now the wife of Millats, the English artist, whose works of art he does not admire as he does Turner's. The other day he startled those who are indebted to him for their appreciation of that astounding manipulator of the brush, by selling at auction his entire stock of Turner's studies. So there was a long row of carriages at Christic & Manson's auction rooms, and the powdered footmen lined the pave while a great crushing of silks and fingering of catalogues went on in the room above. But for being expected to admire I should have called the whole lot daubs.

As for the lecture, which I had really forgotten, and really would forget still, but for the fame hundring which are then thread of the text. Kesuming this painfully, you read on five or six lines nove, and are once more jolted off the track into the rut of another foot-note. Perhaps the great Gibbon set the most effective example of this kind of practice; only it is just to say that his notes are searcely ever overloaded, that they usually are directed by some intelligible purpose of reference, and that, when they are not this, they are repositories of something which might well have been left out altogether, but still which is better in the obscurity of a foot-note than thrust into the broad and open day of the text. This is a very different thing, however, from a practice that is growing up, among writers otherwise of merit, of turning the foot-note into a special region where they may skip and frisk, denounce and extol, epi-As for the lecture, which I had really forgetten, and really would forget still, but for the few bungling notes I took on the spot, it was a weird jumble. There were some superb sentences, and some fine thoughts. We were told the spiritual significance of the earth, air, water and fire, the meaning of the myths and the gods, and all that. We heard of the gentleness of Eros, "lord of the beneficent rinds;" of the "broken drifts of fhe showery spirith, wind," of the symbolism of the winds; of their "famine and thirst of heart," and their "hearpiet all torture of desire;" of the harpies and, firens, the: "maidens with bird's wings and firens, the: "maidens with bird's wings and fightly as if they were turning a couplet; and sum up in a phrase any system of which they may have chanced to bethink themselves.
