There are conflicting accounts of the affair, buffrom what can be ascertained it seems that Dugan was sent to Third street by his father, to make a purchase. He was returning along South street, and by some means unknown, got into a quarrel with a man named John Gillespie, who was passing in the opposite di-rection in company with three women. Gillespie came up and renewed the attack. He had a knife and Dugan was cut several times before he got away. He walked up to Seventh street, where he fell upon the side to the Hospital. An examination by the sur-geons discovered seven wounds in different parts of the body. The most serious wound is in the oneck. Dugan is unable to speak and his recovery is considered impossible.
