When Mr. Carlyle points to the English peerage as the salvation of the country, we suppose we must believe that there is some valuable meaning at the bottom of his interance, but for the life of us we cannot make out what it is. Mr. Browning has of late recovered himself from that abyss of profound unintelligibility into which he at one time plunged; but we would appeal to any one whether he had not, at the time when he wrote the following stanza, a very considerable contempt for than vulgar capacity. When Mr. Carlyle points Preceded by two of these champions as
