OBITUARY. DIED-In the Adirondocks, on the 20th inst., ED-WARD BOLSTER, of this city, aged 23 years.
Such was the brief notice which brought sorrow to pany a circle of loving friends; true, they had long known of the wasting vitality of their darling—that Consumption had marked him for her own, and they knew, toorthat his adventurous spirit had recently car ried him, encedled as he was, on a long and laborious journey to the mountains and the forest in search of relief, but they, like him, were full of hope and unex pectant of the sudden summons.

He was gifted, gentle and good. Long ago his failing health had compelled him to give up his early-formed design of devoting himself to the church. Though for years past he had been a confirmed valetudinarian, scarce a day passed that he did not de clop some new gift, manifest some greater power, do a good act, and in many graceful ways reveal still more and more the beauty of his fine mind and pure soul. To those far inferior to him in years and in knowledge he was a mentor, a brother, a friend, and a joyous play fellow. He loved them and they adored him. His colection of minerals and shells, his taxidermic specimens the works from his easel, his pencil and his pen, ar

Surrounded by a few of his juvenile friends, he was faithfully nursed far away in the wilderness of the wild Adirondacks. On Tuesday last, as his young brother raised his fevered head that he might see the splendor of the first purplings of the dawn, a sight he leved so well to gaze upon, and inhale the fresh and balmy odors of the forest, which he so foully hoped would prolong his life, he said, "Thank you, Tom; I'm better now"—then—a long, deep sigh and—he was DEAD. His soul had soared to its Creator, but there lay his mortal remains in the thickest of the rude wilderness, remote from the out-posts of civilization, and hundreds of miles away from home. Over lakes and rivulets, around rapids and falls, through the forest, by mountain paths and roads, they were brought by the mournful boys who had been camping with him, to a point intersecting the regular route of travel, and thence to their final resting-place, in the remantic ground adjoining the Church of St. James the cas. There he lies near the church he so truly loved se choir he had so often chaunted. When we remember the living, glowing FAITH which inspired his parents to teach and train him in the pracice of the noble virtues and graces that adorned his life we feel that they, in their bereavement, have means of onsolation far transcending every expression of con-

His many friends now mourning over their loss have their precious legucy of his example in all that was lofty, generous, tender and pure, and they will ever cherish the sweet memory of his worth.
