[For the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.] Coldly beat the December rain, All day long on the window pane; All day long on the marble sill And the oaken casement, cold and still. So glooming in mist the grand old house, That one might have fancied the garret Whispering her family words of cheer. While her own little heart was chilled

Marble and oakwood, and mist and rain, Made of the window a fitting frame For the face and the beautiful golden hair Of the woman dreamily watching there. May-be she, now, through the drizzled pane Through the pattering, bitter drops of rain. In the mist can see a drift of years, And measure them scorn, that ask for tears May be the clouds in their madness above Might picture a loving heart ruined through

Picture a shame and a curse and a prayer, And an innocent child with golden hair. For one who is waiting beneath the tide Of the mournful sea should have called Another is-where? O winds that have kissed

Saw you anywhere in the world to-day

A little golden-haired girl at play? But the drifting years + their tale is so old; The face of a woman exchanged for gold-A life that Heaven accounts a lie. Teaching the heart it were better to die-This is their telling: inscrutable Fate! Ever your secrets are told so late. What wonder if now the December rain Seem a mocker, beating the window pane If the white stone steps and the gravelled wall (Where shadows at night were said to talk,) Or the ivied wall, with its old-time gate,

All answered the years—So late! So late! A moment only there pleaded a tear In each penitent eye. She dashed them With jewelled hands, and all desolate, Another time said defiance of fate. "I will forget!" But her woman's heart Even then remembered enough to start And to stop its beating almost, before The Herald of Fate in the opening door "Only a beggar"—the servant replied To her eager glance—and bowed aside. Only a beggar! the falling rain On the cold stone steps and the window pane. Only a beggar! hardly the sea Will carry that echo silently.

Something prophetic, some wonderful word Of that inner language, her being stirred; And haughtily waving them gone, alone She passed down the stately aisle of stone While strangely enough, in this hour of need, Seemed her feet entangled with damp sea

And whiter her face than the marble floor-And colder her heart: she opened the door. The whirling rain and the sad wind bore Through the house a cry that forevermore Should answer the moan of that far-off sea With its echoes ;-"Thus was it to be :" "One in the slime of the ocean beds: "Two on the pitiless cold steps-dead!"

All warm and bright on the window pane Now shineth the sorrowful sun-in vain; For the poor tired heart in the jewelled breast And the golden hair, have gone to rest.

As the proceeds of these public auctions at Paris amount annually to up ward of thirty millions of francs, and as, owing to the augmenting population of the capital, the number of auctions is continually on the increase, it is evident that the position of taxateur is in great demand. —The very unequal force with which various colors are reproduced in photography has been so insuperable an objection to direct photography has been spraphs from good copies made by hand in graphic versions of the old masters, that photographs from good copies made by hand in black and white have generally proved far preferable. In accordance with this well-known fact, Signor Morelli, perhaps the most accomplished copyist in Europe, has for a long period been engaged in preparing for multiplication by the camera a series of fac-similies of the masterpieces in the National Gallery. His last work of the series is after the new Michael Angelo, "The Entertainment."
