INTEMPERATE TEMPERANCE. The New York Tribune yesterday quoted, with singular aptness, in reference to the Politico-Temperance movement of the present day, the Divine maxim that "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." We fear that this truth is likely to be exemplified in the action of the Temperance Convention which meets in this city to-day. That Convention is assembled for to be voted at the next election. The intentions of the managers of this movement are of the light" are in great danger of proving their want of wisdom, and of doing a very serious injury to their own cause. They are embarking in a movement which, while it cannot possibly hope to succeed in its professed purposes, may exercise a considerable influence most damaging to the interests of temperance. The cause of temperance is not to be promoted by independent conventions and

They brought a new element into the scene. Mr. Motley: had not intended to speak, not regarding speech-making, apparently, as the chief function of diplomacy. But he could not well leave unanswered so pointed a reference to his country and to himself; and he waived what has been with him an unvaried rule since his Liverpool reception. His acknowledgment of what the Prince had said was brief—neither too much nor too little; and he passed from that to a few very graceful and greatly-applauded sentences on Mr. Peabody.
