The place of the THE SERVANT OF THE DRAMA.

Perhaps there is no matter in which literature is more at odds with common experience than in the fancy delineations we find in it of domestic service. In the drama especially we are introduced to a relation between master and servant of which we know absolutely nothing; the whole wags, in the milliamant—Nay, he has done nothing, he wags, nit proin the has only talked. Nay, he has said nothing, he wags, neither, but he has contradicted everything, neither, but he has contradicted everything that has been said. For my part, I thought would and he would have quarreled.

Or where the same lady appeals to her maid after some loss of temper:

There were present Secretaries Cox and Robeson, Postmaster-General Creswell, General John E. Smith, General John E. Smith, Porth Thirteenth street; every convenience, and in good order. A vous dire le vrai, les amans sont bien fous—they are all one and the same wise, alert, rough-spoken embodiment of mother wit. On the other hand, Monsieur Jacques, cook and coachman to L'Avare, is a character. He is a blunderer, not from want of brains or natura density, but from the pre-occupation of an any lower of the process of the pre-occupation of an any lower of the process of temper:
