What a sad thing it is to see a man close a grand career with a plagiarism in his mouth. Nappoleon's last words were, "Tete Tarmee." (Head of the army.) Neither of those remarks amounts to anything as "lest words" and reflect the most honorable intentions. All of which is respectfully submitted with the most honorable intentions.

He should sible to make pictures of people's last words. write them out on a slip of paper and take the judgment of his friends on them. He should never leave such a thing to the last hour of his life, and trost to an intellectual spurt at the last moments to enable him to say something smart with his latest gasp, and launch into eternity with grandeur. No—a man is apt to be too much larged and exhausted, both in body and mind, at such a time, to be reliable; and, may be, the very thing he wants to say he cannot think of the very thing he wants to say he cannot think of the very day that the Liberal party purged the country of all the nobler blood, who, attracted by royalty, lent their aid to the unfortunate Maximilian. You see now many of the eccle-of representatives, and he observed, casually, This is the last of earth." The last of earth? Why the "last of earth," when there was so much more left? If he had said it was the last rose of summer, or the last run of shad, it he meant to say, was, "Adam was the first and Adams is the last of earth," but he put it that unmeaning observation on his lips.

And there we have Napoleon. "Tete d'armee." That don't mean anything. Taken by itself, "head of the police." And yet that was a man who could have said a good thing if he had And this Marshal Neil, with half a century at his disposal, could not dash off anything better, in his last moments, than a poor plagiarism of another man's last words which were not worth plagiarising in the first place. "The French army." Perfectly irrelevant—perfectly flat—interly pointless. But if he had closed one eye significantly and said, "The subscriber has made it lively for the French army," and then thrown a little of the comic into his last gasp, if would have been a climate and the little of the comic into his last gasp, if would have been a climate and little of the comic into his last gasp, if would have been a climate and little of the comic into his last gasp, if would have been a climate and little of the comic into his last gasp, if would have been a climate and little of the comic into his last gasp, if would have been a climate and little of the comic into his last gasp, if the latter is which the Indians were decimated from the perfectly by the persection to which they were subject. [Acapulco Correspondence of the Alta California.]
It affords pleasure to see how this despised race commenced to gain an ascendancy from the very day that the Liberal party purged the country of all the nobler blood, who, attracted by royalty, lent their aid to the unfortunate Maximilian. You see now many of the ecclesiastical estates and city houses owned by Indians, who have escaped from the turmoils of war, and whose modest cottages did not excite the cupidity of roying bands. They have also been among the victims.

Now these Indians commence to take amore lively interest in public affairs, they are largely represented in Congress by members of their kin, and have partly withdrawn from the clerical influence which kept them subjugated for centuries. Instead of burying their dollars, as they used to do, they have bought many of the estates whose former owners lost their property by confiscation or by the ruin public in property by confiscation or by the ruin public in property by confiscation or by the ruin public in their property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin point in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation or by the ruin public in the property by confiscation in REFERENCES:
