A Washington despatch says:

"There are between eighty and ninety millions of gold in the Treasury now available for the market should the Secretary choose to sell fit. It is not thought by the officials at the Treasury Department that the Secretary will be tempted into emptying his coffers by any movement of the Wall street bears,", no matter how formidable it may appear. Secretary Boutwell has not followed the example of his predecessor, Mr. McCalloch, in this respect for the reason that the latter found himself oftener at the mercy of Wall street than able to control it by selling his surplus gold. Secretary Boutwell will sell gold and huy bonds whenever he thinks it to the interest of the government to do so, without regard to any combinations of the gold gamblers. He thinks it would be much easier for the latter to make a corner in gold if they knew that there was little or no gold in the Treasury than if there were ninety or a hundred millions in reserve. It is not likely, therefore, that the demand of a radical New York paper for the Secretary to sell gold in order to prevent the gold gamblers from making a combustion to advance the premium will be heeded."
