THE DAILY EVENING BULLETIN-PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1869.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR. Dead is the air, and still! the leaves of th locust and walnut Lazily hang from the boughs, inlaying their intricate outlines Rather on space than the sky,—on a tideless Faintly afar in the depths of the duskily withering grasses Ratydids chirp, and I hear the monotonous rattle of crickets. Dead is the air, and ah! the breath that was wont to refresh me Ont of the volumes I love, the heartful, whispering pages, Dies on the type, and I see but wearist acters only. Therefore be still, thou yearning voice from the garden in Jena,— Still, thou answering voice from the park-side cottage in Weimar,— Still, sentimental echo from chambers of office Ye, and the feebler and farther voices that Sound in the pauses ! Each and all to the shelves I return ; for vain is your commerce Now, when the world and the brain are numb in the torpor of August.

AN AUGUNT PASTORAL.

Over the tasselled corn, and fields of the twiceblossomed clover, Dimly the hills recede in the reek of the colorless hazes: Dull and lustreless, now, the burnished green Duit and histretess, how, the burnshed green of the woodlands;
 Leaves of blackberry briers are bronzed and besprinkled with copper;
 Weeds in the unmown medows are blossom-ing purple and yellow,
 Roughly entwined, a wreath for the tan and wrinkles of Summer. Where shall I turn? What path attracts the Eager no more as in June, nor lifted with Whitherward look for a goal, when buds have Harvests are reaped, and grapes and berries are waiting for Autumn?
 Wander, my feet, as ye list! I am careless, to-day, to direct you; Take, here, the path by the pines, the russet carnet of needles Stretching from wood to wood, and hidden Here, in the sedge of the slope, the centuary, Opens her stars all at once, and with finer than Sweetens the barren aridity,—censer of fields Now, from the height of the grove, between Over the falling fields and meadowy curves of Glimmer the peaceful farms, the mossy roofs Gables gray of the neighboring barns, and

The contrast which it offers to Mr. Packer's rival aspirants—Mr. George II. In fact Mr. Packer's sentences are more noteworthy for the concealments they attempt than for the declarations they conthey attempt than for the declarations they con- | tion of the internal revenue laws. On negro suffrage, he is equally afraid to express his sentiment hiding behind the same thin and well worn fence. Even in regard to woman's suffrage, he branches out in an evasion, and gives us Solomon's description of a virtuous woman, which is, of course, wholly forgign to the subject.

As to the Eight-Hour law Judge Packer tells ns what he has always been and always will e, pretty much as Audy Johnson used to rehearse the story of his own rise from the rank of a village Alderman to the highest station; | sanity. but he says not a word about the merits of the law.
