The Nashville Press and Times, speaking of the right which every legislative body has to protect itself by excluding obnoxious members, cites the case of the Hon Jesse D. Bright, of Indiana, who was expelled from the Senate by a resolution offered by the Hon. Andrew Johnson, then Senator from Tennessee. The latter supported his resolution by a forcible speech, in which he showed that though no overt act of treason was believed to be a dangerous man, and the Senate had an undoubted right to protect itself by expelling him. Mr. Johnson showed by reference and argument that the Senate had supreme authority over its own organization, and that the safety of the people was its highest law. The question is naturally suggested, therefore, whether if Mr. Johnson himself be chosen to represent Tennessee in Washington, the Senate of the United States may not follow his own precedent and refuse him a seat on account of his indecorous attacks on Congress, and the contempt which he has tried to cast upon its laws. It will be well, concludes the Press, for the Legislature of Tennessee to reflect seriously. divised as to the movements and intentions of the Fenians. At a meeting held in New York
