In the basilican churches—that is, those built by the early Christians-like the Roman balls of justice, the priest said mass with his face to the people standing behind the altar.

In these basilican churches a large umbrella was generally suspended over the head of the priest; and it is said that the cardinal who takes his title from them asserts his privilege of having an umbrella held over his head in all solemn processions. All the cardinals had an umbrella with their red hats; but afterwards the latter were limited to those who took title from a basilican church. Beatiano, an Italian
