DETAILS OF THE LAST DAYS OF SAINT-BEUVE.

(From the Figaro of October 13.)
When Dr. Gosselin (surgeon of La Charité hospital) came at ten o'clock yesterday morning, to the bedside of the old friend of the patient, Dr. Veyne (one of the oldest friends of the patient) had been watching without ceasing for some time past, the two physicians looking at each other and comprehended. The patient was lost!

At half-past one Saint-Beuve expired, attended by Dr. Veyne, M. Troubet, his secretary, and a woman who has directed his house, held for fifteen years; and who, during this long period of his incessant suffering, has devoted upon him the most devoted and touching attentions. During the latter part of his sickness, and especially the last three days, these attentions have been such that Saint-Beuve could not cease praising the devoted woman and continually repeated that an angel was watching at his pillow. The last hour of Saint-Beuve was completely silent, and the words which his lips endeavored to whisper could not be heard, when he was surrounded by three persons who surrounded him could hear a faint cry, which passed from the dying man with his last breath.

Saint-Beuve died in his house Rue Montparnasse, No. 11, in the chamber on the first floor (second story), which was at once his bedroom and study. This apartment, like the rest of the house, was in a state of old-fashioned simplicity; a wardrobe, a bureau, easy chairs and common chairs covered with green damask, books scattered everywhere, two plaster busts of Voltaire and Rousseau, an iron bedstead with a very thin mattress and no curtains, these are all the comforts.

The life in this habitation was perfectly peaceful, and Saint-Beuve has died as he lived. When we entered the chamber we have described, the corpse, covered to the chin with a white cloth, had the air of slumbering in a comfortable bed. The face was the only indication that death had been there for some time. A few minutes before his death Saint-Beuve had recovered the fine expression of his last days, and after death his head was beautiful and imposing.

We find in the Gazette:
Saint-Beuve remarked to his housekeeper, Mlle. Bolland, a former school-teacher, "I am dying; let us give to the poor until the end. Let us try to do good up to the moment of going." Visitors who surprised Saint-Beuve in the morning would see him handing to his chambermaid the copy needed by the printers, and several little parcels, which he had prepared himself the evening before.

From the same journal:
Yesterday at three o'clock Dr. Pioge, in the presence of several persons, made the autopsy of the corpse of Saint-Beuve. The lungs were discovered; the largest was the size of a large hen's egg, five to six centimetres long, and the other three were of the same size. The heart was of the size of a large hen's egg, five to six centimetres long, and the other three were of the same size. The heart was of the size of a large hen's egg, five to six centimetres long, and the other three were of the same size.

The charity of the deceased was proverbial, and the people who are told of a touching piece of feeling on the part of his pensioners. Some months since Saint-Beuve was obliged by sickness to keep his bed. A French physician, the author employed occasionally to do his duties, came to him always paid liberally, came to beg for a rather larger assistance than ordinary, and the old man turned his head and wept. Saint-Beuve asked him the cause of his weeping. "Ah!" replied the poor wretch, "you see, Monsieur Saint-Beuve, if you should go and die, I should be obliged to beg for my pension, for you are my only means of existence." The phrase brought a smile to the lips of Saint-Beuve, who consoled the poor fellow by giving him what he asked.

Saint-Beuve was passionately fond of animals. He had in his house three tom-cats and two tabbies. The latter, both clothed in magnificent black and white suits of fur, are named Gabriel and Joseph. There were likewise two rabbits, which, having grown very tame, played about the garden with the cats. More than once the cook conceived the plan of buying them some of the best of the market, but each time Saint-Beuve reproved them. Care is now taken that these poor animals whom he loved so well should want for nothing. Saint-Beuve was accustomed to give to the study-table of Saint-Beuve to pick out bread, having paid their usual visit to-day; finding nobody, they began to coo, hearing which he entered the room and gave them the crumbs they have been used to receive.

Here is the passage in Saint-Beuve's will relative to his funeral:
"I desire that no religious ceremony be held upon my decease."
"I demand of the companies and bodies of which I have the honor to be a member, not to cause themselves to be represented at my inhumation by any deputations, happy and grateful if some of my colleagues and confidants will care to accompany my remains individually."
"I do not wish that written invitations be distributed at the day and hour in the papers which I have mentioned. I desire that this hour be the earliest possible (also in the morning, for instance, or at the latest), I ask to be carried directly from my residence to Montparnasse Cemetery, to the vault where my mother lies, without passing through the church, which I could not suffer without violating the sincerity of my sentiments. Arrived at the grave, do not wish any discourse nor eulogium to be pronounced over the tomb."

A criticism on Saint-Beuve in the Avenir National terminates as follows:
"Like all those who, possessing disdain of politics and social passions, are attached to life beyond their individual passions and personal interests, Monsieur Saint-Beuve overpowered by conviction, but in hopes of an official situation. Since 1822, the life of Saint-Beuve had been his besetting desire. To obtain it he spared nothing, and he marched for it, like a soldier, with his staff and his baggage. He attained, he has lived, he has died, and he has left behind him a name which will live as long as the world exists."

—A priest was confessing an old cropper at Baden. "Well, my brother, it is a solemn penance that you have to say." The dying man promptly replied: "Not much, father, most extraordinary thing that I have done on earth; I saw 28 come out eleven times running."

THE CUBAN PRIVATEER. Release of the Steamer Lilliam.

The steamer Lilliam, of yesterday, from the Cuban paper, La Resolucion, of yesterday, says: "We are able to assure our readers that the Cuban man-of-war Caspedes, or Lilliam, has been released by the British authorities of Nassau."

We publish this fact in order to show that what the newspapers here said about this steamer, that she was to be considered as a pirate by the tribunal of New Providence, is entirely false. We repeat that this fact is not true, and that the Cuban man-of-war Caspedes has already been released by the authorities.

THE CUBAN REVOLUTION. Operations in the Vicinity of Trinidad.

Important Admissions of a Spanish Lord to the Insurgents Pronounced. Efforts Against Their Return to the Island. Oct. 28, 1869.—I do not know that any of our readers have seen the very significant article of the Imparcial, a Spanish journal of this city, which appeared in its issue of the 17th. It contains the hard words concerning the insurgents, who are carrying on the war, according to the best light they have, are of the paper and not my own:

"What has passed in the neighborhood of Trinidad for the last three months it is impossible to believe without having seen. This place, of 14,000 inhabitants, has become a sort of volunteers, a body of Bomberos (armed firemen), and a section of cavalry, and yet it is the country about is under the control of a party of bandits and assassins, who are lords of the soil. Not a man can go to bathe in the river between the hill La Vigia (on which the city is situated) and the bay, without being exposed to the risk of being killed or captured. The water is so smooth as the palm of the hand, and of no greater size than two kilometers long and one kilometer wide. The scene, day after day, of incendiarism, and assassinations, which have been recorded in these columns, commencing at the shop, situated outwards from the city, which we have seen burned, there followed the firing of the estate Abato at the far end of the pass; of the other bridges of the railroad by Papayal; the houses on the country estate of his Excellency Señor Don Justo G. Cantero, and, in conclusion, the hundred attacks on laborers on the different estates situated within this small radius—all of which, and many others, have been recorded in these columns, and which have done nothing but being done to punish the laborers and assassins, who only attack the defenseless and the solitary. This has convinced the country people of the necessity of being changed here these burning operations is up to the country estate of his Excellency Señor Don Justo G. Cantero, and, in conclusion, the hundred attacks on laborers on the different estates situated within this small radius—all of which, and many others, have been recorded in these columns, and which have done nothing but being done to punish the laborers and assassins, who only attack the defenseless and the solitary.
