nated with any other than fresh and perfect virus may be partially and for a time, but not completely and for a lifetime, protected against small-pox, no matter how often re-vaccinated The prevalence of small-pox in New York has resulted from perfectly natural causes, and was predicted as far back as 1868 from facts well ascertained and boldly asserted, namely that not less than 100,000 of the city population were unprotected against the kind and quantity of small-pox contagion that was then liable to be spread in the streets and tenements of the city. It was asserted by the present Sanitary Superintendent, that the small-pox contagion then prevalent in other cities of our contagion then prevalent in other cities of our country, and in the ports whence our emigrants came, would soon make that contagion current here. With small-pox present in purposes over-crowded tenement-houses in numerous over-crowded tenement-nouses the city; with the contagion arriving from every point of the compass and by uncontro able means; and with 100,000 of the population unprotected from the disease, the preser degree of its prevalence was simply inevitable It is clearly the duty of the sanitary authori ties and the people alike to speedily secure to every unprotected person in the city the best possible vaccination. Physicians owe it to their profession and the people to give hearty support and aid to whatever may be publicly necessary to this end. It is just and proper for the people to know that the medical officer of the Board of Health adhere to the mos exact methods and scrupulous care for insuring perfect results in their public vaccinations; and hat all the vaccine virus used by them was, by a few months ago, derived from a heifer which was found suffering the natural kine-pock in a nerd in Cayuga county, New York. Thus far, it is said, not a death, not an accident, not an unhealthy sore, nor any eruption, save the sim-ple vaccine vesicle, has resulted in the entire experience of these officers during the autumn and winter.—New York Tribune.
