Nation last week had some very just strictures on the contempt with which they are regarded by the particular intelligence of the question intelligence of the particular intelligence of by rather intelligent spectators who plume themselves on having seen the original marthes. True about the actions of the bles. True, about the antique statue there is a glamour, an adventurous sense of time's buffetings and history's revenges; but in the pure way of art, the cast is a better work than a re- work of attachments. The wife or husband is stored antique, with its patches of divers tints, its conspicuous seams around the patches, its its conspicuous seams around the patches, its nose of a different degree of polish or translucency from the face, and all the obvious discrepancies between the ruin and its continuations. The plaster, though of inferior beauty tions. The plaster, though of inferior beauty to the half-transparent marble, is homogeneous, and represents the pure form divested of accidents.—One consideration the Nation did not find occasion to state. A polished marble surface always seems to "sink in;" that is, a feasive in marble seems narrower than the same shape in chalk, and the limbs of the Apollo apear much more slender than those of the plaster, and the interest of precisely the same dimensions.
