Premature Cronking-The Prospect Good The New York Bulletins ays the prospects of the fruit crop are unfavorable, and that the peach crop especially is said to have suffered so that the "yield in New Jersey and Delaware will be much smaller than was anticinated," and after explaining that this unforfollowing the remarkably mild weather of These reports may not be fully verified. but fears are generally entertained among the farmers of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Dela-ware, Maryland, Virginia, and Tennessee, that the peach crop is practically destroyed for the year, except in certain favored localities." Commenting upon this, the Wilmington well posted in peaches as it is on the money ket, or it would not talk about Pennsylvania, Virginia and Tennessee as peach-produc States. It is a matter of very little moment to any persons outside their limits whether their sparse and scattered peach orchards bear or not. New Jersey does raise a good many peaches, however, and its remarks may, for anoth we know, be true of the prospect there, but, so far as they refer to Delare and the adjoining counties of Maryand, the greatest peach-producing region in the world, they are entirely incorrect. Never was the prospect more cheerful for a good yield than now. In the upper part of the Peninsula, where the yield was so immense year, there may be some falling off, as the same trees seldom, if ever, produce two large crops in succession, but there are a great many new trees that come in bearing thi year, and they will probably counterbalance the falling off, while in the lower part of the

The the failing off, while in the lower part of the peninsula, and especially the lower part of this State, where the crop was killed last year, the prospect is now excellent. Of course we speak of the present prospect only: the dangerous time for it is yet to come. A sudden sleet and freeze after the buds are open is fatal, while snow or frost on the open buds does much damage. No buds have opened yet however, and New York has no cause yet to feel uneasy as to next year's supply of the luscious fruit.
