Mr. Moran's reputation is rapidly extending. During the past winter he received contemporaneous advertisements from the bupit and from the stage. Before his Arch street audience, lately, Mr. Withrow took occasion to notice the regrettable difference between "a celebrated artist" and the Académy Directors; while, in his burlesque of Don Juan, the comedian Craig is in the habit of saying nightly: "How pretty we look; we ought to be painted by Edward Moran!"

Mr. George C. There was a gentleman named Livingston, who belonged to one of the old families of New York; he lost his property in the crisis of 1837. There was a vacancy in the appraisers' department at New York, by removal or death. He was a Catholic. Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, taking a letter from Bishop Hughes, went to Mr. Tyler, and had Mr. Livingston appointed appraiser. Nobody in the custom-house had any respect for his report; nobody had any respect for his signature. The custom was to respect for his signature. The custom was to inclose his return to another appraiser in an enmobile.

When Mr. Polk came in everybody thought Mr. Livingston would be removed, but Mr. Livingston remained. Mrs. Hamilton was living, and Bishop Hughes was there, and, in addition to that, there was a petition got up in bis favor, headed by Martin Van Buren, and signed by all the leading influential Democrats in the State of New York.

That document would be worth $500 for the autographs alone. I knew he could not be removed; but when the tariff of 1846 was made, I was one of Walker's Congress, as it was called. Mr. Walker sent for me to go to Washington to help him frame a circular, to arrange the bill. I went there, and worked for some time with him.
