the second-class on the roof. We had second- class tickets, and when I found that we were	18
to sit on the roof I became still more troubled at the idea of thirty miles more under these	18
eircumstances; but on we went, and when I saw the nice houses and pleasant scenery I forgot my troubles, and thought that the com-

The evening was spent in rejoicings, and among those present who were overjoyed to see the return of the one who was given up for lost none was more merry than the escaped captive. An East Indian at Versailles. The readers of the Aligurh Institute Gazette have lately been entertained with the experiences of Moulvie Syud Ahmed Khan Bahadoor, C.S.I., during his visit to Europe. What seems to have pleased him most was the Palace of Versailles, and the description of his excursion from Paris on the day after his arrival from Marseilles is told with a good deal of amusing naïveté: Calling upon God, we entered a large doorway where there was a dense crowd of people going into another doorway. The commissaire stopped, went to get tickets, and said, "Let us go." I then felt sure that the door we entered was Versailles. An East Indian at Versailles. The readers of the Aligurh Institute Gazette have lately been entertained with the experiences of Moulvie Syud Ahmed Khan Bahadoor, C.S.I., during his visit to Europe. What seems to have pleased him most was the Palace of Versailles, and the description of his excursion from Paris on the day after his arrival from Marseilles is told with a good deal of amusing naïveté: Calling upon God, we entered a large doorway where there was a dense crowd of people going into another doorway. The commissaire stopped, went to get tickets, and said, "Let us go." I then felt sure that the door we entered was Versailles. Their we saw a most extensive and beautiful railway, station, with the train ready to start, seeing which I became quite troubled, having been in a train all night and then walking about until I was tired; but the commissaire had already taken tickets. The carriages here are double—the first-class go inside and the second-class in the roof. We had second-class tickets, and when I found that we were to sit on the roof I became still more troubled at the idea of thirty miles more under these circumstances; but on we went, and when I saw the nice houses and pleasant scenery I forgot my troubles, and thought that the commissaire had acced wisely in placing us on the roof. My heart gladdened, and I said it would be well if we were going a greater distance. At length we arrived at Versailles. his captors, and for whom they demanded 1,000 livas as ransom, he left Volo by steamer for Salonica, where he arrived on Friday, the 1st inst., and visited his relations there—the family with whom I am at present residing. The evening was spent in rejoicings, and among those present who were overjoyed to see the return of the one who was given up for lost none was more merry than the escaped captive. An East Indian at Versatlles. The readers of the Aligurh Institute Gazette have lately been entertained with the experiences of Moulvie Syud Ahmed Khan Bahasedoor, C.S. I., during his visit to Europe. What seems to have pleased him most was the Palace of Versätlles; and the description of his excursion from Paris on the day after his arrival from Marseilles is told with a good deal of amusing naïvete: Calling upon God, we entered a large doorway where there was a dense crowd of people going into another doorway. The commissaire stopped, went to get tickets, and said, "Let us go." I then felt sure that the door we entered was Versailles. Then we saw a most extensive and beautiful railway, station, with the train ready to start, seeing which I became quite troubled, having been in a train all night and then walking about until I was tired; but the commissaire had already taken tickets. The carriages here are double—the first-class go inside and the second-class on the roof. We had second-class ion the roof. We had second-class in the roof. We had second-class in the roof, which is a did it would be well if we were going a greater distance. At length we arrived at Versailles. A short distance from the station we came upon a door or iron-railed gate, through which we saw that there were houses and gardens beyond, and then we discovered that these were the palaces where the former kings of France used to reside. After a while the order came for the doors to be opened, and we all went in. I thought I had entered Paradise—all was so beautiful within. The evening was spent in rejoicings, and among those present who were overjoyed to see the return of the one who was given up for lost none was more merry than the escaped captive. An East Indian at Versatiles. The readers of the Aligurh Institute Gazette have lately been entertained with the experiences of Moulvie Syud Ahmed Khan Bahadoor, C.S.I., during his visit to Europe. What seems to have pleased him most was the Palace of Versailles and the description of his excursion from Paris on the day after his arrival from Marseilles is told with a good deal of amusing naivete: Calling upon God, we entered a large doorway where there was a dense crowd of people going into another doorway. The commissaire stopped, went to get tickets, and said, "Let us go." I then felt, sure that, the door we entered was Versailles. Their we saw a most extensive and beautiful railway station, with the train ready to start, seeing which I became quite troubled, having been in a train all night and then walking about until I was tired; but the commissaire had already taken tickets. The carriages here are double—the first-class go inside and the second-class ion the roof. We had second-class tickets, and when I found that we were to sit on the roof I became still more troubled at the idea of thirty miles more under these circumstances; but on we went, and when I saw the nice houses and pleasant scenery I forgot my troubles, and thought that the commissaire had acted wisely in placing us on the roof. My heart gladdened, and I said it would be well if we were going a greater distance. At length we arrived at Versailles. A short distance from the station we came upon a door or inor-ralled gate, through which we saw that there were houses and gardens beyond, and then we discovered that these were the palaces where t	2500 South Street. 1870. An East Indian at Versatiles. The readers of the Aligurh Institute Gazette have lately been entertained with the experiences of Moulvie Syud Ahmed Khan Bahadoor, C.S.I., during his visit to Europe. What seems to have pleased him most was the Palace of Versailles and the description of his excursion from Paris on the day after his arrival from Marseilles is told with a good deal of amusing naivete: Calling upon God, we entered a large doorway where there was a dense crowd of people going into another doorway. The commissaire stopped, went to get tickets, and said, "Let us go." I then felt, sure that, the door we entered was Versailles. Their we saw a most extensive and beautiful railway station, with the train ready to start, seeing which I became quite troubled, having been in a train all night and then walking about until I was tired; but the commissaire had already taken tickets. The carriages here are double—the first-class go inside and the second-class ion the roof. We had second-class tickets, and when I found that we were to sit on the roof I became still more troubled at the idea of thirty miles more under these circumstances; but on we went, and when I saw the nice houses and pleasant scenery I forgot my troubles, and thought that the commissaire had acted wisely in placing us on the roof. My heart gladdened, and I said it would be well if we were going a greater distance. At length we arrived at Versailles.
