FROM NEW YORK.

[ By the American Press Association.] McFarland Interviewed. NEW YORK, May 11.—The Standard of thi morning publishes an interesting interview with McFarland last night, in which he laid the whole blame of his troubles upon Mrs. Calhoun and Mrs. Sinclair. He says he intends to question the validity of the Indiana divorce. He spoke affectionately of his wife, and intimated his present love for her in burno the door, said: "You see he is crazy, and we have to watch him."

He threatened to prussic acid down her throat and to let his heart's blood out before her. He said he kept loaded pistols with which to shoot her at any moment. One morning, after a drunken orgic, he struck her a blow across the face, which caused her to reel backward, and which she ould never forget.

After this she always caught his eye whe he was in a passion, fancying he could do her no mortal violence while sho preserved a silent self-control. She believes her life was thus Sometimes he approached her with his arms extended and his fingers bent like claws, as if to clutch at her throat, saying: "How I would like to strangle you! Your life is bound some time to end in a tragedy! Your blood will be on your own head!"

He became bitterly enraged at times, and drank heavily. He used expressions in Richardson's hearing that I could not endure. At last he decided that he was willing that we have the decided that he was willing that we last he decided that he was willing that we should separate, and that I hight go back to my father's house. At midnight he bade her an eternal farewell, saying he was certainly going to destroy himself. He then took another notion, and begged her forgiveness. She then placed herself under the protection of Mr. Sinclair's roof, and never afterwards saw Mr. McFarland except in the presence of others. Mr. Richardson's treatment of her was always most respectful and most reserved Her boy, seven years old, was always present during his visits. He simply pitied her.

Mrs. McFarland speaks of her accidental introduction to Mrs. Sinclair, who treated he with much kindness and real charity, and s cured for her husband a-situation—Mr. Sin-clair giving her house-rent free. On New Year's Day, 1867, McFarland drew two weeks' salary due her at the theatre, and went "on a drunk," leaving her to pay her board bill. For the first time she complained to Mrs. Calhoun the her burden seemed too heavy to bear. Sh hen relates her accidental meeting with M ardson, who came to the same house to b. McFarland saw her in his working room, getting her some manuscripts. Subsequently, he saw her struggling through the world with her children, separated from her husband, and he loved her. Anyone knowing Richardson would understand the allusion to the love of her as the growth of years was simply sentimental, as he had known her only a few months. She regrets her parting with Percy.
Regarding her divorce in Indiana, she says she knew McFarland had committed adultery while she lived with him, and had been offered proof of his committing that crime since she left him, but she preferred to obtain the divorce on the ground of drunkenness, extreme cruelty and failure to support her. She beheves McFarland was born to do murder. She married Richardson because she was free and he desired her to do so. She pities McFarland. e complains that Judge Davis was not alemory, and her honor and reputation-her st friends. In conclusion, Mrs. McFarland says: "It is well known that I have been on trial before a New York Court as well as Mr. McFarland, and for a crime more heinous, more bitter punished in woman than murder committed by man. It is clearly seen, by all who see dis-passionately, that wherever a loop-hole opened passionately, that wherever a loop-hole opened for any truth about my conduct or Richard-son's, it was immediately stopped.
