Death of Nestor Boqueplan.

The most Parisian of all the Parisians has just died. M. Nestor Roqueplan, the late editor of the Figaro, the director of the Varietes, the Opera, the Opera Comique, and finally of the Opera, the Opera Comique, and finally of the Chatelet, was born in 1804; but nobody knew his real age until his death, for he was most careful neither to speak bf it nor even to let it be seen. His dress, his manners, and even his face were calculated to deceive on this point his best friends. M. Roqueplan has always been of opinion that advanced age is neither fashionable nor artistic, and that it was an offence to the æsthetic feelings of one's fellow-beings to let it be seen. Nobody knew Paris so well, nobody loved it more, and nobody has been so servilely devoted to all the caprices of that capricious eity. During the last years of that capricious eity. During the last years of the seen before the service of the service of the capricous eity. During the last years of that capricious eity. During the last years of that capricious eity. Few things became ever really popular in a certain part of Parisian society if they did not enjoy the approbation of M. Roqueplan; just as few witty boulayard words have ever come into circular.
