LETTER FROM PARIS.

respondence of the Philada. Evening Bulletin.] PARIS, Friday, May 20, 1870 .- The spring here is just now in its prime. The country, ficeut. Even in the city the superb avenues of horse-chestnuts—now in full foliage and bloom —the numberless public gardens and squares, teeming with sbrubs, and flowers, and tropical plants, with which Baron-Haussmann has de-corated what may almost be called his capital, give to Paris at this season an internal aspect of brightness and spring verdure, such as you will find in no other metropolis of equal syou will find in no other metropolis of equal magnitude. From the Bois de Boulogne, on the extreme west of the town, to the Bois de Vincennes, on the extreme cast, you may now ride or drive alour a road as smooth and as in spite of the want of rain, is looking magni-Vincennes, on the extreme east, you may now ride or drive along a road as smooth and as beautifully kept as that of an English Park, shaded with trees on either side, and not a bit of pare left either to shake your carriage or knock your horses' feet to pieces. All these knock your horses' feet to pieces. All these are great and enjoyable privileges, which are placed within reach of all classes of the Paris-ians, even without going beyond the bounds of their own fortifications. And enjoy them, they their own fortifications. And enjoy them, they ness of figure,-plain, respectable, intelligent- Their own fortinications. And enjoy them, they do not in the provided of the the lation of the second device of the second meal on a bench considerately provided for him under the trees of an avenue, or in the nearest public garden, and in the nearest public garden, and or in the nearest public garden, and then stretches himself out for a snooze after his meal, feeling himself to be seen how much he valued the glory cellence if his Grace had not been aduker. But after his meal, feeling himself to be seen how much he valued the glory of being descended from the poet. By and by, you may see this enjoyment in the famille bourgeoise, which, on a Sunday, troops off al-together, man, wife, children and servants, to the Bois de Boulogne, in the van or covered cart used for buisness during the week—there and pathos. After rejoining the laders is bivonac and lie on the grass all day, in some shady nook. It is a glorious rendezvous, and a holiday for every one—except the horse!— and even he enjoys the fresh grass on which he is turned out to graze without let or hindrance. But you must go'a little farther, and get her what he considered the best engraving of barriers, and some choir with him, and he promised to given be what he considered the best engraving of barriers, and some coher remembrance of him. One is always environs at this time of year. One is always with Sir Walter Scott, when, as Lockhart in instant a mile, but as me present in the solution of a state of the astomshed to find now much these latter are neglected and ignored by strangers who visit Paris, and even by English and Americans, who ought to have a natural taste for such things; yet with the exception of barely "doing", one or two-such places as Fontainebleau.

which I will mention presently. We swept down past St. Ouen, where, on the right, stands its fine chateau and park, with such stands its fine chateau and park, with such I read the last scene of the "Scarlet Letter" said he admired, and he found the man more admired, in admirable than his books! I hope so, cernot to exist in France, embowered in groves and one mass of color, with the beautiful Judas tree, likes, pink horse chestnut and Laburnam tree, macs, pink horse chestnut and Laburnam. The banks are high and bold, and the old park walls covered with creepers: a most nicture in party months. I think there were a storm, but was in a very many months.
