England to be Assaulted Next.
A London correspondent of the World says:
The German newspapers are already letting the cat out of the bag. When Germany get through with France, which will be soon, of even before the war with France is ended should anything occur to protract it, she will turn her attention to England, whose conduct in many ways has been very offensive of late, and will thrash her out of her boots. This is thrash her out of her boots. This is what the Cologne Gazette and the Magdeburg Gazette, and other German newspapers are saying, and it is pretty well known that these journals are generally inspired from Berlin when they speak about foreign affairs. "We have 150,000 troops at home, besides the army in France," says the Magdeburg Gazette, "ready to send against England or any other neutral power who shall dare to attempt to rob us of our victory. Does any one in England believe that the British fleet and the 20,000 men whom England is preparing for war would suffice to dictate to such a powerful nation as ours?" This may be all froth and brag, but it is significant, nevertheless, of the dauger that threathers not England only, but all Europe—the dauger, net of French, but of German ambition. If Prussia conquers France, she will believe that no bounds can be placed to her ambition, and then we shall see lively times. "For the selection were for my horself as wall as of Europe." Engiand only, but of German ambition.
If Prussia conquers France, she will believe that no bounds can be placed to her ambition, and then we shall see lively times. "For the sake of Germany herself as well as of Europe," says a London journal this morning, "it is not desired that Prussia should remain with the pounder guns with them, and we doubt much if their sleep, artillery contains guns of any such callibre.
