THE PEACE NEGOTIATION.

It is impossible to determine accurately, from the obscure and contradictory cable reports, the progress of negotiations between France and Prussia, and the chances of peace. It must be confessed, however, that the stories which are received are not of a very promising character, and that there is no good reason for hoping for an early cessation of hostilities.

One of the principal difficulties in the way is the disposition of Prussia to accept the Provisional Convention as a fair representation of the people, and to repose faith in its power to make good its promises. This obstacle does not seem less serious with the progress of the negotiations, but is actually made more formidable by the violent revolutionary demonstrations in several of the cities where the Republicans are strong enough to prevail.

France and Prussia are now in a position to make peace, but it is not unlikely that the action will be delayed by the various factions. It is impossible to perceive how such a difficulty can be overcome, unless Favre is permitted to carry out his scheme of a popular election and to organize a government which shall be assured of the support of the people. That can hardly be accomplished, unless the Prussian army in France is conducting offensive operations with vigor, and as King William manifests an intention to refuse an armistice, he must either treat with the Prussian government, without guarantee as to his life, or after the capture of Paris, proceed to set up a bogus government after his own fashion, with which to arrange a treaty of peace.

It is very certain, however, that this creature, no matter what its components, would be repudiated by the French people, and that Prussia would have no better success in the fulfillment of the treaty than she would if she had accepted the present government. That is, Prussia would have no better success in the fulfillment of the treaty than she would if she had accepted the present government.

THE BATTLE BEFORE PARIS. The French have attacked the Prussians to the south of Paris, and have been totally routed and driven to the suburbs. The Prussians have advanced and taken a favorable position. The battle was fought at Clamart, Meudon and Versailles.

THE PRUSSIAN POSITION. Prussian Batteries Commanding Paris. The Prussians have established a strong position around the city, and are well supplied with artillery and ammunition.

THE ISOLATION OF PARIS. The Prussians have cut off all communication with the city, and are preventing the entry of supplies. The situation is becoming more desperate with each day.
