MEN ON FIRE.

"A man on fire," would be a terrific cry; "Men are burning," is hardly a less startling statement. Somthing like this is often said in a figurative sense, as when we speak of a man being burnt up with rum; or, on fire with zeal; but to say that men are really and literally burning all the time, as wood burns, seems at first enough to startle everybody. Yet this is not far from the exact truth. Ordinary burning, is simply the rapid union of oxygen with some other substance, usually carbon. It is a process; a phenomenon nothing else. The same process only slower, is going on with our bodies all the time. The chemical element uniting are the same; the products are the same; the effects are nearly the same. Heat is produced-less violent it is true-the ruddy glow answering to the slow flame.

But this is only a general statement; to appreciate it we need to enter a little into particulars. One portion of food we eat bears no part in building up either the frame or tissues of the body. It enters neither into bone or muscle, but its function is simply to produce heat. Carbon is the principle, indeed almost the only, solid ingrediant of this portion of our food. It appears in the first analysis in some form of starch or sugar. These two substances are almost identical in their nature, and are composed of carbon an oxygen and hydrogen, the latter two being almost in the exact proportion that forms water; so that both starch and sugar may be said to be pure carbon and water. By far the largest part of many articles of food consists of this element. Not taking into account the water, wheat bread, for example, contains fully thirty-nine per cent. of starch or sugar, while potatoes contain no less than ninety-two per cent. of the same. Taking all our food together, more than four-fifths of the whole is of this material, and serves only or chiefly the purpose of keeingp us warm.

The account of the process by which this is done, would be something like the following:-These substances when taken into the stomach, are converted by the process of digestion into the variety of sugar known as "grape sugar"-so called because it is identical with the sugar of the grape, the incrustation on the raisin being the same. This grape sugar is most readily dissolved; and so dissolved in the stomach, it is taken up by the little vessels which lie along the intestinal canal into which the food passes into the stomach. Through these little vessels it finds its way into the veins, which in turn convey it, mingled with the venous blood, to the right side of the heart. And thus it is that the blood arrives at this point charged with two nces, on account of both of which, it needs communication with the air. One is the carbonic acid which it has brought up from previous combustion in the various parts of the body, and which, like the gases in a chimney, needs vent. The other is this new carbon, in the form of sugar, which it has just taken up from the food, which, like fuel in a furnace, needs oxygen. We say, in case of the furnace, or stove, it needs "draft." Effectually to secure this is the purpose of that wonderful contrivance, the lungs. These are made up of an immense number of little membranous bags or cells, varying in size, but, on an average, not more than one-hundredth of an inch in diameter. The total number of these cells almost exceeds belief. They have been estimated as high as six hundred million. The membrane which separates them is the thinnest concievable, and throughout upon its surface is spread a net-work of exceedingfine blood-vessels. Into all these minute vessels the blood, so much needing air, is forced by the action of the right side of the heart, (which is hardly any thing more than an ingenious and powerful forcing pump.) The thin membrane separating the bloodvessels from the air and cells, offers little resistance to the oxygen of the air, which readily passes through and mingles with the blood, the blood at the same time giving up the carbonic acid which it contains. This carbonic acid passes off with the air which is thrown out from the lungs; but the blood, having now this solution of oxygen or carbon, and a new supply of oxygen, is returned to the left side of the beart from whence, by another powerful forcing process, it is sent out into all parts of the body, the oxygen seizing hold of the carbon and slowly consuming it as it goes; this process of burning-for it is burningnotbeing completed till the blood has reached the very extremities. The amount of carbon thus burnt up within the veins of a man is easily computed by arresting the carbonic acid which is thrown out and measuring it. Experiments has shown it to be from five to fifteen ounces a day in an adult man; and, burned in this way, it gives out the same amount of heat it would if burned rapidly in the fire upon the hearth. It is by this that the warmth of the body is maintained at so uniform atemperature; and the wisdom of the arrangement is manifest when it is remembered that if the temperature of our bodies were to fall much below ninety-five degrees we should die. Certainly it would not do to depend on external fires for this. The furnace should be within and man should take proper food as fuel, just as he intelligently puts wood on the fire, In cold climates he must use more fuel in his body as well as in his house. Hence, we can easily believe the accounts, otherwise incredibly, of the Esquimaux, for example, eating twelve pounds of tallow at a meal. They would die upon the diet of a torrid climate, as certainly as the people in the latter would die if attempting to live upon a Greenlander's food.

There are always more or less obstructions of the liver, a weakness and friitable state of the stomach, and great torpor of the bowels, being clogged up with vitiated accumulations. In their treatment, a purgative, exerting a powerful influence upon these various organs, is essentially necessary. There is no cathartic for the purpose equal to Da. J.
