tarir A very ludicrous leap-year incidem occurred near Connersville, Ind., a fev olor on retiring at night nithout first mak tog an examination of the surrounding, put out the light and crawled into bed, but to his surprise he soon found he bid a bed-fellow. He quietly arose, lighted bis lamp, and proceeded to explore the nitua tion; the firsthing that caught hin eye.sight was a snowy night-cap, cozily resting on the pillow at the back of the bed. He the pillow at the back of the bed. He looked no firther, but extinguikhed light, he seized his clothes and beat a ight, he soizesins lifies and heat a hasty retreat. Dressing himself, after getting a safo distance from the yoom, gresing he called up the man of the house to make inquiry in regard to the strange occupant of his room. occupant of his room. He conld give no information about it, no information about it, and called his wife into council. It was, all a mystery to her, and the fandlord in company with the discomfited boarder, concluded to make a tour of observation. Cautioualy they entered the apartment and approached the bed. The sloeping beauty was undisturbed. In fet ty was undisturbed. In fact she was resting as quietly as though one half of the bed was her legitimate property. The old gentleman in no very aminhle mood reached over, oaught her by the shoulder and rudely dragged her forth. Just then a wild scream of laughter from the adjoining room startled the cars of the two gentlemen, and in fiet the old gentleman men, and in fact the old gentleman most heartily joined in it. The seeming woman was only a bolster and some pillows, cunningly arranged and placed there by some of the young the house. concluded that the young gentleman has accidents in fature to wive to avoid such right to occupy the vacant place.

it duke take such. His face was so grave and his manner so hesitating that the pity manner so hesitating that the protty face said, in the sweetest of tones: "Would you like a better half?"
"Well," stammered Jinks, his heart in his mouth, his face crimson, "I wouldn't object, provided, Miss, the-the-right person would accept me," person would accept me, The pretty face blushed, too; but three months later the twain became one flesh, as above stated.
