LOST IN A CAVE.

The Hannibal, Mo., Courier says: Some days ago we mentioned the fact that the mouth of an extensive cave had been unearthed in a stone quarry in South Hannibal. Since its discovery it has been a favorite resort for boys, who have daily made explorations of the vast subterranean labyrinth. Yesterday, however, an expedition was organized to explore the cave, the adventures of which are destined to give the newly-discovered cavern local fame and history that will not soon be forgotten. The lads composing the party were five in number, from 12 to 13 years old.

The boys entered the cave about 10 o'clock yesterday morning, each provided with a small bit of candle two or three inches long, all burning at once, and the little torch light procession marched through the silent depths very gaily and happily, looking for curiosities and searching for strange scenes. Our herces had determined to make a thorough exploration of the unknown cavern, and went on, and on, through the winding rifts and fissures of the rocks until their candles had nearly burned out, and when they attempted to return they found themselves in the condition of the five foolish virgins, and were left in total darkness to grope and crawl amid mud and dirt, sharp stones and jagged tocks.

None of the parents of the boys missed them until late in the evening, and upon inquiry of some of their playmates it was ascertained that they had gone into the cave at the hour named, since which time they had not been heard of or seen. About five o'clock last evening the alarm was given that five boys were lost in the cave, and in a short time a large crowd, estimated at five hundred to six hundred persons, was gathered about its mouth, among them the fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, relations and friends of the lost children, all in terrible suspense, and shedding many bitter tears, and their feelings during the long and painful hours of search can be better imagined than here described.

Searching parties were organized to explore the cavern, and as they would return with no tidings of the lost ones many parent's heart wore filled with anguish, and all manner of horrid deaths were conjured upon as having befallen the little fellows who were thus buried alive. Small persons were in demand to enter the cave and look for the lost ones, as, owing to the formation of the rifes, it is impossible for a large person to squeeze through in many places, and money was freely offered for volunteers to prosecute the search, as well as a reward for the one who should bring out the boys.

Several parties returned from the cavern without gaining any trace of the boys, and the hours of suspense seemed like daysmidnight was approaching, and still a large and anxious crowd stood around the dread opening, and among those present were many ladies. Candles were furnished in abundance, while balls of twine were provided and led in through the windings of the cave to afford a guide for those who entered to return. Charles McDaniel also took in with him, in his first exploration, a paint pot and brush, with which he marked arrows on the rocks pointing toward the month of the cave. These precautions enabled those who entered to readily find the
