

NEW YORK CONTINENTAL

Life Insurance Company, OF NEW YORK, STRICTLY MUTUAL!

Assets, $6,539,325.62!

ISSUES all the new forms of Policies, and presents as favorable terms as any company in the United States.

Thirty days' grace allowed on each payment, and the policy held good during that time.

Policies issued by this Company are non-forfeiture.

No extra charges are made for traveling permits.

Policy-holders share in the annual profits of the Company, and have a voice in the elections and management of the Company.

No policy or medical fee charged.

L. W. FROST, President, M. B. WYNKOOP, Vice Pres't.

J. P. ROGERS, Sec'y. J. F. EATON, General Agent.

No. 6 North Third Street, College Block, Harrisburg, Pa.

THOS. H. MILLIGAN, Special Agent for Newport.

6 42 1/2

Perry County Bank!

Sponster, Junkin & Co.

THE undersigned, having formed a Banking Association under the above name and style, are now ready to do a General Banking business at their new Banking House, on Centre Square,

OPPOSITE THE COURT HOUSE,

NEW BLOOMFIELD, PA.

We receive money on deposit and pay back on demand. We discount notes for a period of not over 60 days, and sell Drafts on Philadelphia and New York.

On time Deposits, five per cent. for any time over four months; and for four months four per cent.

We are well provided with all and every facility for doing a Banking Business; and knowing, and for some years, feeling the great inconvenience under which the people of this County labored for the want of a Bank of Discount and Deposit, we have determined to supply the want; and this being the first Bank ever established in Perry county, we hope we will be sustained in our efforts, by all the business men, farmers and mechanics.

This Banking Association is composed of the following named partners:

W. A. SPONSTER, Bloomfield, Perry county, Pa.

H. F. JUNKIN, Wm. H. MILLER, Carlisle, OFFICERS:

W. A. SPONSTER, President.

WILLIAM WILLS, Cashier New Bloomfield, 3 5 1/2

BALL SCALES!

L. B. MARYNERTH, D. W. DERR and L. JAMES H. GIER, known as "The Ball Scale Company."

have now on hand a large supply of Buoy's Patent COUNTER SCALE, the Simplest, Cheapest and best Counter Scale in the market.

For Scales, or Agencies in Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, address "The Ball Scale Company," Pottsville, Schuylkill county, Pa.

For Scales or Agencies in this County, apply to the undersigned, where they can be seen and examined any time.

J. LEIBY & BRO., Newport, Perry co., Pa.

FRANK MORTIMER, New Bloomfield, Perryco., Pa.

LEBANON Mutual Fire Insurance Company,

OF Jonestown, Penn'a.

POLICIES PERPETUAL at Low Rates. No Steam risks taken. This is one of the best conducted and most reliable Companies in the State. Country property insured Perpetually at $1 00 per thousand, and Town property at $5 00 per thousand.

LEWIS POTTER, NEW BLOOMFIELD, PA., Agent for Perry County,

4 16

LOOK OUT!

I would respectfully inform my friends that I intend calling upon them with a supply of good of my OWN MANUFACTURE.

CASSIMERS, CASSINETTS, FLANNELS, (Plain and bar'd) CARPETS, &c.,

to exchange for wool or sell for cash, J. M. BIXLER,

CENTRE WOOLLS FACTORY, 6 17, 4m

J. M. GIBVIN, J. H. GIBVIN

J. M. GIBVIN & SON,

Commission Merchants,

No. 8, STEARNS' WHARF, Baltimore, Md.

es. We will pay strict attention to the sale of a kinds of country produce, and remit the amount promptly. 5 34 1/2

FRESH GARDEN SEEDS For Sale at F. MORTIMER'S, New Bloomfield, Pa.

ENIGMA DEPARTMENT.

All contributions to this department must be accompanied by the correct answer.

Answer to Enigma in last week's Times:—"Jacob C. Hostetter, Perry county, Pa."

Answer to Problem in last week's Times:—

A.....$1,537.50 B..... 798 75 C..... 512.50 D for store.....$512.50 " share of profit..... 266.25 — 768.75

PRSVRYPRFCTMN VRKPTHSPRCTSTN

The two lines above were affixed to the Communion Table of a small church in Wales, and continued to puzzle the learned congregation for several centuries, but at length the inscription was deciphered. What was it?

Was it Murder?

A GREAT many years ago, while I was comparatively a young man, and still unmarried, I resided in a certain city of Pennsylvania, and enjoyed the reputation of being the cleverest lawyer ever known there. It is not for me to say the praise was merited, but I certainly found myself able to discover loop-holes of escape for those whom I defended, which surprised even my fellow-lawyers. I possessed by nature those qualities which would have made me an excellent detective, and I was a thorough student of the law. There was no mystery about it, but among the more ignorant classes I had gained a reputation for more than human knowledge. Perhaps it was not polite for them to say that the devil helped me, but they did.

However, I began to tell you about Madame Matteau.

She was an old lady who owned a little house in the suburbs of the city. She herself was of American birth, but her husband had been a Frenchman, and so the title Madame had been bestowed upon her. She was now a widow, and her daughter Gabrielle, and a son named Henri, were her only living relatives. Her income was but slender, and she eked it out by taking a few boarders, generally steady old people, who had known her for many years. These respected and liked her; but the city generally had a prejudice against her. There had been two sudden deaths in her house. Each time the victim was a stranger who came at night, and was found dead in his bed in the morning. Each time the jury was divided—some believing that strangulation had been the cause of death, some that the man had died in a fit.

It was a terrible thing that two such deaths should have occurred beneath her roof. Madame's friends pitied her. The rest of the little world hinted that these were strangers, and that their trunks, with no one knew what amount of money and other valuable property, remained in Madame's possession. No one said she was a murderess, but every one said it was "very strange." In an odd tone, and no one since that second death had visited Madame Matteau.

I myself—perhaps because I admired her a great deal, and her daughter much more—had always insisted that it was merely a coincidence, and that in a world in which apoplexy and heart disease were so common, it was no such marvel that two men should have met sudden deaths in the house. But my faith in this theory was shaken when one morning it was published over the city that another transient boarder had been found dead in Madame Matteau's house, and that she was arrested on suspicion of having murdered him, his watch and chain having been found in her possession.

Before I had recovered from the shock of this terrible piece of news, a message came to me from Madame Matteau. She desired to see me. Of course I went to her at once.

She had been taken to prison; and I found her in a little room with a barred window, and an insufficient fire upon the hearth. The logs had burnt in two upon the andirons, and the white ashes were scattered over the hearth. Almost in them sat Madame Matteau, in her widow's dress of sombre black.

She was chilly with grief and excitement, and had drawn her chair close to the fire. She shook violently from head to foot, and her face was deadly pale as she turned it toward me and held out her hand.

"O, thank Heaven, you have come!" she said, "I know you can save me. Is it not horrible? How could I kill a man? Why should I? Why do people come in my house to die? To die horribly, with black faces and starting eyes, as if some one had choked them? Ugh! and he was a pretty young man the night before. Oh, good Heaven, how horrible!"

I sat down beside her. I took her hand.

"Madame Matteau," I said, "be calm; collect yourself. As your lawyer, I must know all. Tell me from first to last what happened—what was said, what was done. If you—"

I paused; her black eyes flashed upon me. I could not ask her whether she had any confession to make. I saw she had not. Unless she was the best actress who ever lived, Madame Matteau was innocent of any crime.

"If you have any suspicions," I added, "tell them all to me."

"There is no one to suspect," sobbed the poor woman.

"In the house were Gabrielle, my daughter, whom you have seen, old Hannah, the cook, Mr. and Mrs. Beauchamp, friends of my poor dear husband in his boyhood—the best, the kindest people—Mr. Gray, a very old man, too feeble to leave the house, poor deformed Miss Norman, and the librarian, Mr. Bassford. None of these could or would murder a mouse. See how kind they are; they remain in my house; they send me word that they have no doubt of me. Oh, how can anybody?"

"And this man who—" I began.

"Yes," said Madame Matteau, "I will tell you; he was fair, young, handsomely dressed; he asked Mr. Bassford at the depot if he knew of any one who could accommodate him. Mr. Bassford brought him home. My only empty room was the one in which those other two strangers died. I could not bear to put him there; but Mr. Bassford laughed at me. We had supper afterward. He talked a long while to Gabrielle. It was late when he retired—late for our quiet household. Hannah had made his fire. She came and told us that she had done so. He said good night."

After he had gone, we found that he had left his watch on the table. He wore it only with a bunch of seals, and he had been setting it by the clock, and showing it to us as something very handsome. I knocked at his door to restore it to him. He had not left us but fifteen minutes before, but he must have been asleep already, for he made no answer. So I kept it for the night, and wore it down to breakfast next morning. As I came down I met a gentleman in the hall. He inquired for Mr. Glenn. That was the new comer's name. I sent Hannah to wake him. She could not do so, and grew alarmed. She had a key that would open the door, and used it. The next thing I knew we were all in the room and the windows were wide open, and the door had been sent for; and the young man who had called was screaming that his brother had been choked to death; and then there was the inquest and they arrested me. The brother said the first thing he noticed was that I wore Mr. Glenn's watch and seals. I had forgotten it in my terror."

"So Hannah had a key to the room?" I said.

"Yes; at least it was a key that would open it. It was the key to Mr. Bassford's door. She knocked the other out with a stick and put that in."

"The people who were there on that night were your boarders when the other two men were found dead?" I asked.

"Oh, yes!"

"And Hannah was there also?"

"All my married life Hannah has lived with me."

"Your daughter oversees the household in your absence?"

"Yes, poor child, with Hannah's help. I thought a little while."

"Madam," I said, "there is some strange mystery in this affair. I do not despair of proving to all the world your entire innocence. Meanwhile, be as calm as possible, and endeavor to remember everything connected with the sudden deaths that have occurred in your house. The incident that seems the most unimportant may really be of the most immense value."

So I left her and went home. Strangely enough on the way I met the doctor who had been called in. He was a dull, heavy sort of person, considerably given to beer-drinking, and my opinion of his ability was not very great. However, I questioned him on the subject, and he replied:

"Well you see, I don't say the old woman murdered him. If she did, I should say it was by sitting on him, or smothering him with the bolsters. I suppose the cause of his death was asphyxia. Well, then, what is asphyxia? Why too little breath to keep on living. He died because he was short of breath. So we all do. I wash my hands of the matter. Only there's the watch; that looks dark."

I had learned nothing from the doctor. The coroner lived near me. His jury had been twelve of the most ignorant men in town.

This is all he told me:

"He was smothered, that man was; so were the other two. Men don't smother themselves. We made it inscrutable Providence's other time. We make it murder this time. That there watch, you know."

Thus, without any new light, I went home and formed my plans. There was but one way in which to penetrate the mystery. I must enter the house; I must see the people there; I must penetrate to the rooms in which these men had died so suddenly, and I must not be known in my real character. That Madame Matteau was innocent, I fully believed; but that some one beneath her roof was guilty I made no doubt. It might be the librarian, Mr. Bassford, whose key fitted the dead man's door. It was possible—but no, I would not harbor a mad superstition. There could be no supernatural power beneath which human beings drooped and died. Death as it came to us all was mystery enough. What had been said to me by a woman, who would have been a spiritualist had she lived today, was a mere absurdity.

"I believe that there are some horrible unseen things in the room," she had said "some awful, shapeless spirit, that when it is locked in with its victim murders him. Let others believe what they will, I believe that."

The words haunted me, but I laughed at them of course. What it was, I would try to know. I had a plan.

At dusk that day I went into my bedroom alone. I came out a changed man. I wore a white wig, a pair of great green goggles and an overcoat, the tails of which reached my heels. I had a muffler about my throat and a little hunch on one of my shoulders. I carried a thick cane and stooped a great deal as I walked. In my hand I carried a carpet bag, and in my bosom a hair of pistols well loaded.

As I passed out into the street the early moon was just rising; she lit me on my way to the door of Madame Matteau's house.

It was opened for me when I knocked by old Hannah. Her eyes were red and swollen. Then I told her that I was a stranger and had received Madame Matteau's address from a gentleman in New York, and desired to stay under her roof all night.—She shook her head.

"I don't think you can," she said.—"The lady is away from home. Besides, we are in trouble here. I don't think Miss Gabrielle would—"

But here Miss Gabrielle herself appeared.

"I am an old man, Miss," I said, "and as you see, quite infirm. I dread another step. I should take it as a kindness if you would accommodate me, and I will pay any price you ask."

Miss Gabrielle looked at Hannah.

"We have only one room," she said, "and that—"

I ended the question of my stay by begging to be taken to it.

"You will have supper, sir?" asked the girl.

But I declared that I had eaten and only wanted rest.

Her reply was:

"Hannah, show the gentleman to the blue room and make a fire."

I was in the blue room, the scene of the three sudden deaths or murders. It was a small apartment painted blue. It had also blue window curtains and a blue silk coverlet on the bed; a neat striped carpet, a set of old mahogany furniture, and a very handsome ewer and basin of costly china. It was at the time almost a universal custom to burn wood. In this room, however, was a small coal stove. I alluded to this as Hannah came in with the scuttle.

"Yes, sir," she said, "Missus does burn coals. Her son is a clerk, or the like, at them new mines in Maunch Chunk, and he send it cheap to her; but it's a nasty, dirty smelling thing, and I hate it. Now its built and lit, will warm up in fifteen minutes. It takes longer than wood."

She went out of the door and came back in a minute with a little tray, on which stood a pot and cup and saucer, also a little bowl and tiny pitcher, and something in a napkin.

"Miss sent a bit and a sip," said she.—"Tea rests us old folks mightily. Good-night."

"Good-night," I said "I expect I shall sleep soon; I must be up very early, though, for I have bills to pay. I have some hundreds of dollars with me to pay out to-morrow, and it's in this bag."

She looked at me in a queer sort of a way, and lingered beside me. At last she spoke:

"Look ye, sir," she said, "I think that old folks of your age do wrong to lock doors on themselves. You might be ill at night, and who'd get in to you? Leave your door unlocked."

The moment she was gone I turned the key.

Was it this woman's practice to beg travelers who stopped with her mistress not to lock the doors? Was there some baneful potion in the cup she had given me?

It was an innocent looking cup enough—an old-fashioned affair covered with little gilt sprigs. The tea was fragrant hyson; but the suspicion that had crept into my mind tainted it. I fancied a strange color, a curious smell. I put it from me and would not have tasted it for a kingdom.

I had not intended to sleep, and I did not undress myself. I merely removed my disguise, and sat down beside the table, with my pistols beside me. That some attempt might be shortly made to murder me I felt to be possible. I thought of all the old tales that I had heard of trap doors, and sliding panels, and secret entrances to travelers' rooms. I was not a coward, but I felt strangely nervous; and singularly enough for a man of my perfect health, my hands were growing cold, and my feet were lumps of ice, while my head was burning hot.

Fifteen minutes had passed, and the fire was kindled, but the room was not warm. The blue flames struggled among the black coals, and hung forked tongues tipped with yellow tints into the room. There was nothing cheerful about the stove, though it was of that open style now called Franklin. Yet, I drew a chair toward it from habit, and sat with my foot upon the hearth. I do not know how long I sat there.

Suddenly I became aware that I was not myself. I was losing my senses. If unseen hands had been clasped about my neck, and an unseen knee had been pressed against my chest, my sensations could have been no different.

A thought of the evil spirit which my friend had suggested, faintly struggled into my mind. As I staggered to my feet a noise like the roaring of the sea was in my ears. The flame of the candle turned to a great yellow blue. I barely retained strength enough to stagger to the window and fling it open. The fresh, cold winter air rushed in at it. It gave me intense pain, but it revived me. In a moment more I was able to clamber out of it upon the shed below.

There I remained until the day dawn.—With my returned senses the truth came to me. That which had murdered the three men who had slept before me in the blue chamber, was nothing more or less than the coal stove.

It was provided with what is called a damper, and this being caught in a manner closed it, sent the poisonous gas into the room. It had been kindled as a wood fire would have been at the hour of retiring, by one ignorant of the danger possible from coal gas, and they had slept never to awaken. Had I thrown myself upon the bed, I also should have been found dead at daylight, in all human probability.

As for the fact that neither doctor nor coroner discovered the truth, I have but to say that they were not deeply scientific men—that coal stoves were scarcely used in the place, and that it had not been mentioned that the blue chamber was thus heated.

Of course I rejoiced the household by my discovery the next morning, and equally, of course, Madame Matteau who was not only freed from all suspicion, but became the object of universal sympathy. She was always grate to me, and she proved her gratitude by giving me what I soon asked for, the hand of her daughter Gabrielle in marriage.

A Debt of Gratitude.

ONE day, not long ago, while an English merchantman was on a voyage in the Mediterranean, the captain was called to the hammock of a dying sailor who had asked to see him. The invalid seafarer desired his commander to draw up for him a last will and testament, wherein the sum of $7,000 in English sovereigns was to be devised to a citizen of Memphis, in Tennessee, U. S., and the uncontrollable surprise of the captain in his performance of the request of the sinking man caused the latter to make the following explanation of the past circumstances enabling him to bequeath such a sum of money. An Englishman by birth, he was a mechanic, in Memphis in the year 1861. No matter about the causes of his expatriation and humble foreign occupation. Suffice it to say he had chosen to be a mechanic in America. Only for a short time, though; for when the secession war began he enlisted in one of the Tennessee regiments, having been scarcely able to earn a living as an artisan, and being just recovered from a weary sickness of which he must have died but for the generous ministrations of a family of strangers. Shortly after the discouraged convalescent's enlistment, and before his regiment marched further southward, he received from his family in England the sum of $7,000 in gold, which had been left to him by a dying uncle. Instead of availing himself of this windfall, however, to withdraw from the army and devote himself otherwise than as a soldier, it was his eccentric whim to bury his whole treasure under a tree, in a lot belonging to the gentleman whose family had been so kind to him in his sickness, and to neither speak nor act as though he had ever received any such money at all. Leaving the gold thus secretly placed, he marched away with his military comrades.

Not long was it though before his eccentric character again displayed itself. Becoming speedily weary of the precarious fortunes of war, he deserted from the army into Mexico, and from thence embarked on an English vessel as a common seaman. Reaching England in due time, instead of rejoining his family there, he at once became a sailor on another vessel for a voyage around the world; and had remained an obscure sailor until the fatal sickness overtook him in the Mediterranean and an expiring impulse of gratitude induced him to bequeath his gold yet hidden in Memphis to those who had so long ago befriended him in that city.

Such was the strange, scarcely credible story which he told to the captain in explanation of his curious will; and, after signing the latter with another name than that by which he had been known on shipboard, he carried the remaining mystery of his career with him into the world of shadows.

The captain hardly knew whether to regard either story or will as anything more than the diseased fancy of a madman, but, upon reaching port, mailed the document, as he had solemnly promised, to the address of the Memphis gentleman to whom the buried gold had been devised. And, according to a late issue of the Memphis Register, that gentleman's reception of the will, together with the captain's explanation of the foregoing circumstances, has been followed by a realization proving that the dying wanderer of land and sea spoke truly. The gentleman in question "had some time before sold and delivered to another party the lot on which the valuable sovereigns were deposited. How to get at it now without incurring opposition and perhaps litigation was the question which arose in his mind. After taking the advice of counsel, he concluded to develop the whole matter to the purchaser and owner of the place, and asked for the right to make search. This was done, and the new proprietor generously forwarded his wishes and gave him every facility to possess himself of the treasure. On digging at the foot of the tree described in the will the gold, amounting to $7,000, was happily found and the new owner made glad by the glittering heap." Who the departed giver of this little fortune really was in his native personality is not known, and the secret is buried with him beneath the blue waves of the Mediterranean.