 Two Kinds of Farmers. Porrest Moreland, of Heuvelton, N. Y., in writing to the Comairy Gentleman says: The fanm of the careless, slothml, 1ghorant farmee, is sepmated from that of his more intelligent neighbor by boundaries uere plain than line feicees. Mr. A., while driving in poor team attached to an inferior driving a poor team attached to an inferior drag by a malicious harnens which had already taken itn revenge on the poor animals by galling in numerous places, snddenly strikes a stone and breaks the drag tong since deestring a pention for previous long since deserving a pension for previous injuries. To quote Mr. A.'s own worts, "Thin ts jusf my luck." In fret, an fast ns his tools grow old from too mnech expo-sirus to the weather and lack of suitable care, it is just his luck to have them breaking when he is in a hurry. This, by no meats uncommon accidedt, fursibhes a re-apite for the horsent, and a journey to Mr . A's favorite haunt-the blacksmith's shop.
1'assing farmer B.'s well fenced and Lughly oultivated farm, he observed several young men also eugaged in preparing the young metu aiso eugaged in preparing the min nod nowing grain, but in quite a different style. One is driving a well-kept team hitched to the cultivator on whifolh he is riding. It is an improved implement, wooder "why on afrth Mr. B. wanted to pay so much fur a cultivator when a drag pay so much for a cultivator when a drag in jest as good." The cultivator leaves the sypund in good condition for the improved jazin drill seen in another portion of the fisid: still another invention, an Mu. maniutains, for making lizy farmers. "siless believed in larnin' boys to sow by thani, as their fathers and grandfathers did before them." Mr, A'n boys left himin years ago to learn trades. It was esier for ngo to leans trades. It was easier for the dovout Hindoo to pasa the lives of caste dovout Hindoo to pass the lines of caste Anun for Mr. A'A boys to overcome their father's overweening conidence in the ag nicaltural lore of the past, or pass the boundary lines that separated their condition from that of the more fortunate sons of Mr. B. - boundary lines that hedged thom in, warping their very souls, until they were driven in disgust from a they should have learned to love.
The substantial fence that separates Mr.
Ari farm from that of Mr. B's, is second oniy to the strong line of contrast that nep. arsted them to heir farthest extent. On arsted them to their flarthest extent. On the one hand, a farm well laid out and convenient in all its arrangements; a farm well tited and susceptible of the bighest culttitted and susceptible of the bighest culti-vition. On the other hand, a farp that was never permanantly haid out but, is jaidd out new, yeme after year, to nuit the con-yeniences and varying veniences and varyisg tusto of the owner.
"Variety is the spice of life," and Mr. A. (has ouly to look at his farm, and the view there has so much variety in it) should make hum feel quite spieg. The varioty in the athapen of hif different fields is simply astonishing. His fields are regular and irrogular. No two of his fields are alike. In one the stones have broken his plow and lius drag; have worried his team and hiss tennoter year after year. "But," nays Mr. A., "it never did pay to give that' 'ere field wiy extra work ; is don't anyway." The result is that the stones get a permanent letting alone. In another there is an obvious want of understanding, and Mr. A. has. 'hearu somethin' someWhere 'bout underdrains, but never realy dif believe in thin 'ere fancy farmin." Mr. A.'s farm in devoid of all that pleases the eye or pocket of the intelligent fanmer, for his cropen are so poor that they do not pay for even his poor cultivation. 'Seasobs are goting awfuljonsartin,' says Ms. A.; in fuct, seasons do not seem to be aa good for Mr. A's farme siveo he began selling bits hay and srain Jnstead of feeding it on the farm. Mr. A. is a practical (2) famen. Men of his stamp are found in every farming community. They have been unfortuostely placeos on frims, and they stay
