The Benefits of Fall Plowing That the plowing of heavy solls in the fall is attended with excellent results is generally admitted. That any benefit accrues to soils of a lighter texture, is questioned by many agriculturists, with whom we do not altogether agree. All wimit that the tennelous character of a clay soil is reduced, and its texture opened and rendered less compact, by the operation of frost. The lumps fall apart, are disintegraded by the mechanical split apart, are disintegraded by the mechanical split apart. effect of the expansion in the act of freezing of the water held thetween the particles. But is this the full effect of the forces) of nature which operate in small things as perfeetly as in greater? The power which has forced asunder the clods, and reduced them to fragments, has also had an effect upon these fragments themselves, and has reduced them to particles so small, that the solubility of the soil has been increased. Thus of its simplicity of construction, case of operation, uniformity, of precise action at another effect besides a mechanical any speed, and capacity for the grentest any speed, and capacity of work, fine or course, one has been produced; or rather the operation of mechanical force has a produced for the produced force has operation of mechanical force has fail to examine the best of all Sewing Mabrought about conditions under which chemical action can more readily take place. But we are told that clay alumina and silien, how can another changed. But we are told that clay soils are absorbent, while more silicious soils are more or less leachy, and part with their fertile properties by the percolation of water through them. Then, if this were true, a light or sandy soil would in course of time be washed free from all fertilizing-properties. But this is not the case with these soils. They can be the sand of manure.
