A History and A Warning.

There died, recently at Fort Washington, a man who six-and-thirty years ago was notorious throughout the land as the one man whose forgeries, up to that period, had never in the history of crime been surpassed in magnitude of amount, or skill of conception and execution. Even Fauntleroy's were, as compared with his, the merest trifles. They rose to millions, and for several years were carried on with a celerity, precision and success that were amazing; nor in that particular specialty of crime has any successor reached the aggregate of enormity attained by him.

Benjamin Rathbun in early life removed from Chenango county to Buffalo. He became proprietor of the Eagle Tavern, and by cleanliness, order and discipline made it famous among the hotels of the country.—Extending his business he became interested in lines of stages between Buffalo and Albany, and started the noted "Telegraph Line, for six passengers only," which was run at a speed higher than had been previously attained by coach in the United States, and made for it a name among travelers from the West. But hotel-keeping and staging failed to satisfy his ambition.—He embarked in speculation. Lots without number at prices without limit were bought and dwellings, stores and warehouses were erected. For the first time in the history of the States a fever of speculation broke out which for universality and wildness has never been approached by any other city in the Union. Rathbun was in everything; nothing daunted him; his example was so infectious that the grayest and most timorous money grubbers were drawn into the vortex and in a night made fabulous fortunes—on paper.

The plan of his forgeries was as ingenious as it was original. To certain parties he would propose to buy certain property, or build certain structures. To rise the necessary funds with which to initiate the enterprise, he would make his note for five thousand dollars, payable in New York city at three or six months and asked the party whose interests were to be prompted to indorse the same. The indorsement obtained, he would resort to his counting room and make from ten to fifty notes, of the same date and amount, payable at the same time and place, and his clerk, an excellent penman would forge the endorsement. To such a magnitude had these transactions grown, that a regular office was maintained in this city for the purpose of negotiating the paper, the manager being his nephew.—During the few years that the fraud was kept up the amount negotiated reached millions of dollars. At length one of the five thousand dollars notes bearing the forged indorsement of David E. Evans, then agent of the Holland Land Company at Batavia, was protested and notice sent to him. Mr. Evans paid the note, but on examining the back found to his dismay, that his signature had been forged. True, he had indorsed a note of that date and for precisely that amount, but it was not this. Investigation followed; the plot was discovered and the whole iniquity exposed to light. Rathbun was arrested, tried at Batavia, convicted, sentenced to five years in State Prison, and served out his time.—Subsequently he came to this city and opened a hotel in Broadway, near Courtland street, but was not very successful. Afterward he kept, for some years, the small hotel at the corner of Broadway and Forty-third street. Of all the millions that had passed through his hands he never put away a dollar for himself, nor could he at any time have called himself, the honest possessor of fifty thousand dollars.

The private life of this remarkable man was from his early manhood singularly reproachable. He was modest to a fault, strictly temperate, never chewed or smoked, never gambled, kept no equipage, had no acquaintance with disreputable people avoided public places, indulged in no extravagances, but devoted himself assiduously to his business. He had few acquaintances, fewer friends, no companions. To the past he never alluded. He realized to the full the result of his acts and meekly accepted the situation. Silently, patiently, uncomplainingly he plodded on his weary, cheerless way, until finally, at the ripe old age of eighty-two, himself and his crimes almost forgotton, he fades away.

It would seem idle to recall these incidents of a felony committed before most of our readers were born, if it were not to point a moral as old as society; that the madness which springs from a greed of sudden gain leads naturally to crime, and that it is rarely given to the acutest of human intellects to commit crime and escape. The moral, we admit, is musty, but it never ceases to be timely and, in general, effective. The large majority of business men are honest, and the example of such lamentable lapses as those we have recently seen undoubtedly is a lesson to the young and a warning to the wavering.—*N. Y. Burglars Shot by a Girl.

On Thursday, the 11th ult., at Littlestown, Adams county, a young woman, Maria Riffle, had charge of the premises of Mrs. Jacob Sterner, who was absent from home, and between eleven and twelve o'clock, she was aroused from sleep by a noise in the hall which leads from the street door in front and opens into the kitchen. She immediately jumped from her bed, (telling a little girl, who was sleeping with her for company, a daughter of a neighbor, to remain quietly in bed lest she might accidentally shoot her,) then seizing her revolver, entered the kitchen by a door leading into her bed room, and went to the door opening into the hall. She was in the act of stooping to look through the keyhole when she observed the door opening. With one hand she seized the knob of the door and drew it shut; then followed a struggle between herself and some one in the hall, she striving to keep it closed and the party in the hall to open it. Finally obliged to yield to greater steagth, she removed her hand from the knob, the door flew open inwards towards the hall, and she found herself facing a tall, strong man. She pointed her revolver towards him and fired; the burglar threw up his right hand, caught hold of his left arm near the shoulder and turned suddenly towards the street door. The courageous woman followed and was on the point of discharging her revolver at him a second time, when the little girl, who thought there was rather too much noise for her to remain quietly in bed, called to her and said there was a man on the back porch, looking through one of the lights in the door. She hastened back; saw the man, and says that if there had not been some difficulty in the working of the revolver, she could have shot him in the face. He soon moved from the door; she immediately opened it and fired at him as he was hastening off down the steps, but with what success she could not tell. She then passed through the kitchen into the hall, and thought she saw one of the burglars through one of the side lights. She again fired, the ball passing through nearly the centre of one of the panes of glass along side of the hall door into the street, making a very small round hole in it.

The young woman feels certain that the first ball fired from the revolver entered the arm of the burglar, as he walked out of the hall very slowly without saying a word, and as if he were in great pain.—Very close search was made in the passage way for traces of the ball, but no sign of it could be found, so that it is generally beleived that the burglar received it and carried it away with him.

Entrance was effected through the front hall door either by nippers or false ke
