Poetry.

For the POST.

They will be Made White a Snow.

BY SAMUEL

Out in the dark, cold world alone,
None to love, believe in me!
Friendless, forsaken, day by day,
I wander along on my way.

Youthful in years, in heart old,
To eaten, myself, I
With the rag at my lips
For a lifetime of pleas

Oh! what a horror to
My health destroyed,
And remorse like a
A fiery demon that

I dare not look back,
When my heart was
I long in my innocence
And daily I prayed

But now, Christ,
Breathe but a
Don't touch me!
Rever,
For your heart would this flame.

Yet stay! see from he
The beautiful spirits
Saying, stoner! repent,
Though thy sins
white as snow.

Blest spirit, sweet hope,
To guide by the Keep me firm in the
the end,
My purified spirit

A Joker on His Journey.

A Cashire agri found out "What I know about Farming" is this wise:

Said he, "John, do you know the best way to raise potatoes?"

Says I, "I do."

"How," says he.

"Why," says I, "keep hold of the tops with both hands and pull."

Says he, "go to ——."

So I started ——, and I am now on a trip over the Erie railroad.

The first thing I did after getting into the cars was to try to make myself agreeable. The attempt proved a failure. I saw a man with a package in his hand, and I said:

Have a game?"

Game of what," said he.

"Seven up," said I.

There isn't so much bitterness in a ton of boiled aloes as there was in the expression of that fellow's face. Intense scorn and indignity struggled for the mastery as he yelled out,

"No sir, I am a minister."

"Well," said I, "you needn't get mad. Nobody would ever believe it unless you told 'em so."

Then I told him on closer inspection that he did look like a minister—a minister of the penitentiary—and I asked him what he was doing with those cards.

He said they were not cards, they were blank tickets for the Sunday school library.

Then said I, "What might your name be?"

Said he, "Barnes."

Then I said, with a smile, "There are lots of barns all over the country, ain't there?"

To this day he has never answered that question. He moved into another car.

Back of me sat a little boy. He had a half ticket. The conductor punched it. I said to him, "that boy obliged to have a whole ticket to travel on this train."

He said, "no."

"Well," said I, "he's got one."

"He hain't," said he.

"I'll bet you," said I, "it was a half ticket until you put the pin made a hole one."

He intimated he would "punch me;" so we didn't converse.

I moved over next to a fellow who was short of nose.

"Ahem," said I, "some of mayhem?"

"No," he said, "my dog chewed it last July.

"Ah!" said I, "a mayhem, but Julyhem, eh?"

"Be you from York?"

"I am," said I.

"Do you know Smith?" said he.

Smith," said I, "what Smith?"

"No not Watt Smith, but Jimmy Smith; he keeps a store down there."

He was surprised when I told him "I never heard of him."

"Hewer of water and chopper of grass," I exclaimed, "that is your biz?"

He said he was a ——der.

"Gin miller?" said I.

No sir," said he, "I am not a well regulated Christian."

"Ah," said I "you are a Millerite, then." Just then I made some further remarks. I observed the country looked fine." I didn't exactly know how the country ought to look to look fine, but I hit it right, for he said, "yes," and he and we were passing through a dairy country."

"Do they run trains at night through a dairy country?" I asked, sweetly.

He said yes, and added that mighty good cheese in that section. I related to him how I didn't like mite-y good cheese." I told him "Truth was mighty and must prevail, and cheese was mighty, and that must was prevailing to considerable extent too."

Then we stopped for grub, and I was served with a piece of the steak old John Rodgers had cooked when it was burned ten years worse than he was, and to it three pieces of boiled pump handle on toast. The proprietor asked me how I had been served? I told him I had been served darned mean.
