UPON FALSE COLORS. 'My pocketbook's gone!' exclaimed an excited passenger, who had stepped up to the bar to liquor, and so suddenly found himself without means to liquidate.

'My character, I trust is not to be assailed by the property of one found with stolen property on him,' said the dignified answer.

'This has gone far enough,' said the little man, 'gentlemen, I am Tom Hanley, the detective. I hold a warrant for this man's arrest for murder and robbery. It was he who picked your pocket, for he is an adept in the art. The accomplice to whom he passed the stolen property, I took aside unobserved, and by a little moral coercion induced him to disclose privately, taking good care he should afterwards have no chance to communicate with his principals. Two of my men followed him astern, and ere long he was as hard fast as this one will soon be.'

The detective pulled off his wig and whiskers, when the familiar face of Tom Hanley was recognized by at least a score of those present.

'At a given signal, half a dozen of stalwart assistants, who were with a look for simple passengers, came forward, and in a trice the desperate thief and murderer was taken into custody and manacled. It was taken ashore at the next landing, and in due time had justice.'

What Dreams Signify. The absurd interpretation of dreams which were once so much in vogue, even among the people who should have known better, are now regarded by all as idle food for jest.

At least they have left me my little pillow, he remarked, returning it to his pocket. 'I presume they hadly thought it would pay to rob a clergyman.'

Had we known the gentleman's calling name, we were accountable not to have attributed it, we certainly should have insisted on his exemption from the test he had just undergone.

One after another were put through the ordeal with equally fruitless results, till it came to the turn of a slight-built man, who had been back to the last and when indolently seemed to have dozed off until now.

'Step forward, sir, and submit like the rest,' said the deryman.

'The little man obeyed. As he approached a singular change came over the minister's countenance. It grew pale. In the feeling, what ever it was, was evanescent.

'Do your duty, gentlemen,' he said in his usual tone of amity. 'These appointed to conduct the search proceeded with it. The results were not so barren. Every one of the missing wallets was found in the little man's possession! He did not even flinch at his detection. It was hard to tell whether the clergyman looked more surprised or pained.

'What shall be done with him?' was the general query.

It is a pity the least are so badly administered in rebuffs,' remarked the clergyman.
